

WM. LLOYD GARRISON AND HIS TIMES

S. G. & E. L. ELBERT

Library of Wellesley

College.

Presented by

ELLA SMITH ELBERT '88

In Memoriam

No

KATHARINE E. COMAN

Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON

AND HIS TIMES;

OR,

SKETCHES OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY MOVEMENT IN AMERICA,

AND OF

THE MAN WHO WAS ITS FOUNDER AND MORAL LEADER.

By OLIVER JOHNSON.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

O, my brethren! I have told
Most bitter truth, but without bitterness. — COLERIDGE.

B O S T O N :

B. B. RUSSELL & CO., No. 57 CORNHILL.

SAN FRANCISCO: A. L. BANCROFT & CO. PORTLAND: JOHN RUSSELL.

PHILADELPHIA: QUAKER CITY PUBLISHING HOUSE.

NEW YORK: CHARLES DREW. CHICAGO: ANDREWS & DORMAN.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.: FRED L. HORTON & CO.

1880.

Copyright,
By B. B. RUSSELL & CO., 1879.

BOSTON:
WRIGHT & POTTER PRINTING COMPANY,
79 MILK STREET.
1879.

To the SURVIVING HEROES OF THE
AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY STRUGGLE, IN WHATEVER FIELD OR BY WHATEVER INSTRUMENTALITIES
THEY CONSCIENTIOUSLY LABORED FOR THE DELIVERANCE OF THE LAND FROM THE CRIME AND CURSE OF HUMAN BONDAGE,

This Volume

IS FRATEERNALLY INSCRIBED BY

THE AUTHOR.

PREFACE.

SOME months since the writer of these pages was invited to contribute to the "New York Tribune" a short series of papers, embracing some of his recollections of the American Anti-Slavery Movement, and of the persons most prominently connected therewith. His attempt to fulfil this task was received with so much favor in various quarters, that he was induced, the Editor of the "Tribune" kindly consenting, to go far beyond his original intention, and take a rapid survey of the whole movement, which, beginning in the labors of WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, in 1829, finally led to the abolition of slavery by the exercise of the powers of war, as a means of putting down the Rebellion. The sketches thus written are now gathered, with some slight revision, and with large additions, into a volume, at the suggestion of many of the writer's old friends, and in the belief that in this form they will meet a public want.

The writer desires it to be understood that this volume does not claim to be a complete history of the Anti-Slavery Movement, either in its moral or political aspects. His purpose is simply to make a contribution, which he hopes will be of some value, to the materials for such a history, which may be written by another hand, when the prejudices and passions engendered by the conflict have passed away. The author has attempted, in a series of brief sketches, to present an outline, first, of the action of the Abolitionists up to the divisions of 1839-40; and, secondly, after stating as impartially as he is able the circumstances and causes of those divisions, to follow the course of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and those who co-operated with it, under the lead of Mr. Garrison, to the close of the conflict. This plan, it will be seen, does not embrace a history, however brief, of the anti-slavery political parties, or of the labors of those who worked through these instrumentalities to prevent the extension of slavery, and to resist its encroachments upon the institutions of freedom. Without intending to disparage, in any degree, the action of those parties, or of the men who labored in and through them, but, on the contrary, while gratefully acknowledging the importance and value of what they accomplished, the writer has chosen to confine himself mainly to an account of the MORAL AGITATION, which was the original cause and constant stimulus of political action; and this because, while the progress of the movement, in a political sense, was necessarily conspicuous, and is therefore certain to attract the attention of the historian, — indeed has already been treated with great fullness and ample justice by the Hon. Henry Wilson, in his “History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power,” — the distinctively MORAL FORCES, which were so powerful in moulding public sentiment, are far less likely to receive the attention they deserve.

Mr. Garrison is the central figure in these pages, which contain an outline of his life and public career as the founder and leader of the Anti-Slavery Movement. He will be forever honored, not, indeed, as the first American to denounce slavery as a sin and seek its abolition, — for in this a multitude of honorable and eminent men were before him, — but the first to unfurl the banner of IMMEDIATE AND UNCONDITIONAL EMANCIPATION, and to organize upon that principle a movement which, under God, proved mighty enough to accomplish its object. The laurel will be the more willingly placed upon his brow because he never claimed it for himself, or in any way sought to win the applause of his countrymen. In his speech at the Breakfast given in his honor in London, in 1867, he said:—

“ I must here disclaim, with all sincerity of soul, any special praise for anything that I have done. I have simply tried to maintain the integrity of my soul before God, and to do my duty. I have refused to go with the multitude to do evil. I have endeavored to save my country from ruin. I have sought to liberate such as were held captive in the house of bondage. But all this I ought to have done.”

Having been associated with Mr. Garrison from the beginning, and served the cause at times not only as a lecturer, but as temporary Editor of “The Liberator,” and later, at different periods, as Editor of the Ohio “Anti-Slavery Bugle,” the “Pennsylvania Freeman,” and the “National Anti-Slavery Standard,” the writer has enjoyed unusual opportunities for observing the progress of the cause, for studying its principles and the nature and character of the opposition arrayed against it, as well as for becoming acquainted with the men and women by whose toils and sacrifices it was carried forward, through great difficulties, to a successful issue. With Mr. Garrison himself he was on terms of the closest intimacy, from the founding of “The Liberator” to the day of his death, and is therefore entitled to speak of his character, his aims, purposes and spirit, with something like authority. In doing so, however, he has aimed to speak not as a partisan, but as a conscientious if not a quite impartial observer. He has written of matters and things, “all of which he saw, and part of which he was”; and yet, writing sometimes in haste and without opportunity to consult original documents, it will be strange if he has not fallen into some minor errors, which, however, it is believed, will not impair the integrity of his narrative.

Of one deficiency the author is deeply sensible. He has done but scant justice to many noble workers in the cause, whose zeal, devotion, and unswerving loyalty entitle them to the gratitude of mankind. Most of these, indeed, limited as he was for space, he has not been able so much as to name. But their "record is on high," and they have their reward in the remembrance of what they did to open the way for the emancipation of four millions of slaves. Let me here record, and make my own, the tribute paid to them by Mr. Garrison, himself, in London, in 1867:

"Here allow me to pay a brief tribute to the American Abolitionists. Putting myself entirely out of the question, I believe that in no land, at any time, was there ever a more devoted, self-sacrificing, and uncompromising band of men and women. Nothing can be said to their credit which they do not deserve. With apostolic zeal, they counted nothing dear to them for the sake of the slave, and him dehumanized. But whatever has been achieved through them is all of God, to whom alone is the glory due. Thankful are we all that we have been permitted to live to see this day, for our country's sake, and for the good of mankind. Of course we are glad that our reproach is at last taken away; for it is ever desirable, if possible, to have the good opinions of our fellow-men; but if, to secure these, we must sell our manhood, and sully our souls, then their bad opinions of us are to be coveted instead."

If this volume shall serve to give to the people of this and future generations a clearer apprehension of the instrumentalities and influences by which American slavery was overthrown, the writer's highest ambition will be fulfilled.

INTRODUCTION.

I DO not know that any word of mine can give additional interest to this memorial of William Lloyd Garrison, from the pen of one of his earliest and most devoted friends, whose privilege it has been to share his confidence and his labors for nearly half a century; but I cannot well forego the opportunity afforded me to add briefly my testimony to the tribute of the following pages to the memory of the great Reformer, whose friendship I have shared, and with whom I have been associated in a common cause from youth to age.

My acquaintance with him commenced in boyhood. My father was a subscriber to his first paper, the "Free Press," and the humanitarian tone of his editorials awakened a deep interest in our little household, which was increased by a visit which he made us. When he afterwards edited the "Journal of the Times," at Bennington, Vt., I ventured to write him a letter of encouragement and sympathy, urging him to continue his labors against slavery, and assuring him that he could "do great things," an unconscious prophecy which has been fulfilled beyond the dream of my boyish enthusiasm. The friendship thus commenced has remained unbroken through half a century, confirming my early confidence in his zeal and devotion, and in the great intellectual and moral strength which he brought to the cause with which his name is identified.

During the long and hard struggle in which the Abolitionists were engaged, and amidst the new and difficult questions and side-issues which presented themselves, it could scarcely be otherwise than that differences of opinion and action should arise among them. The leader and his disciples could not always see alike. My friend, the author of this book, I think, generally found himself in full accord with him, while I often decidedly dissented. I felt it my duty to use my right of citizenship at the ballot-box in the cause of liberty, while Garrison, with equal sincerity, judged and counselled otherwise. Each acted under a sense of individual duty and responsibility, and our personal relations were undisturbed. If, at times, the great anti-slavery leader failed to do justice to the motives of those who, while in hearty sympathy with his hatred of slavery, did not agree with some of his opinions and methods, it was but the pardonable and not unnatural result of his intensity of purpose, and his self-identification with the cause he advocated; and, while compelled to dissent, in some particulars, from his judgment of men and measures, the great mass of the anti-slavery people recognized his moral leadership. The controversies of Old and New organization, Non-Resistance and Political action, may now be looked upon by the parties to them, who still survive, with the philosophic calmness which follows the subsidence of prejudice and passion. We were but fallible men, and doubtless often erred in feeling, speech and action. Ours was but the common experience of Reformers in all ages.

“Never in Custom’s oiled grooves
The world to a higher level moves,
But grates and grinds with friction hard
On granite boulder and flinty shard.
Ever the Virtues blush to find
The Vices wearing their badge behind,
And Graces and Charities feel the fire
Wherein the sins of the age expire.”

It is too late now to dwell on these differences. I choose rather, with a feeling of gratitude to God, to recall the great happiness of laboring with the noble company of whom Garrison was the central figure. I love to think of him as he seemed to me, when in the fresh dawn of manhood he sat with me in the old Haverhill farm-house, revolving even then schemes of benevolence; or, with cheery smile, welcoming me to his frugal meal of bread and milk in the dingy Boston printing-room; or, as I found him in the gray December morning in the small attic of a colored man, in Philadelphia, finishing his night-long task of drafting his immortal “Declaration of Sentiments” of the American Anti-Slavery Society; or, as I saw him in the jail of Leverett Street, after his almost miraculous escape from the mob, playfully inviting me to share the safe lodgings which the State had provided for him; and in all the varied scenes and situations where we acted together our parts in the great endeavor and success of Freedom.

The verdict of posterity in his case may be safely anticipated. With the true Reformers and Benefactors of his race he occupies a place inferior to none other. The private lives of many who fought well the battles of humanity have not been without spot or blemish. But his private character, like his public, knew no dishonor. No shadow of suspicion rests upon the white statue of a life, the fitting garland of which should be the Alpine flower that symbolizes Noble Purity.

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

10TH MO. 3, 1879.

CONTENTS.

I.

Preliminary — The Revolutionary Period — The Quakers — Benjamin Lundy — The Hour and the Man — Birth and Boyhood of Garrison — He Learns the Trade of a Printer — Becomes a Writer and an Editor — In Boston and Bennington — Joins Lundy in Baltimore — His Imprisonment, 19

II.

Garrison's Imprisonment, and its Effects at the North—The Release —Whittier, Clay, Tappan—Partnership of Lundy and Garrison Dissolved—Tribute of the Latter to the Former—Founding of "The Liberator" in Boston rather than in Washington—Garrison on a Lecturing Tour--Boston and the Cotton Traffic—Garrison Appeals in Vain to the Clergy—Dr. Lyman Beecher and Jeremiah Evarts—"The Liberator" Born in a Dark Time—Purposes and Hopes of its Founder—Responsibility of the Church, . 35

III.

The First Volume of "The Liberator;" Its Size and Appearance — Scenes in the Office — Distinguished Visitors — Mr. Garrison's Alleged "Bitterness" — Alarm of the Slaveholders — Incitements to Kidnappers — Indifference at the North — The Nat Turner Insurrection — Appeal of "The National Intelligencer" to the North — Mr. Garrison's Defence, 50

IV.

Mr. Garrison's Early Orthodoxy — No Odor of Heresy about him until long after the Churches and the Clergy had Rejected his Message — A Christian at the Last no less than at the First — Reluctance of Ministers to Pray in Anti-Slavery Meetings — Rev. Amos A. Phelps and his Book — The A. B. C. F. M. — The Methodist Church — Dr. Whedon's Denial — Testimony of Judge Jay — The Freewill Baptists, 67

V.

The First Anti-Slavery Society — Differences Among Friends — Triumph of Principle over Expediency — The Anti-Slavery Twelve and their One Traitor — A Dismal but an Auspicious Night — The Quaker Hatter — The First Appeal to the Public — Dr. Beecher's Opposition — Emerson — Great Expectations and an Invincible Faith — Might of the Opposition — The Quakers — Cheering Words from Over the Sea, 82

VI.

Colorphobia Illustrated — Its Meanness and Cruelty — Doctors Gurley and Bacon — A Contrast — The Nat Turner Insurrection — Discussion in Virginia — Why it Failed to Accomplish Anything — Power of Immediatism as a Principle, 99

VII.

Battle with the Colonization Society — Garrison's "Thoughts" — An Indictment with Ten Counts — Discussion — Mr. Garrison gives the Colored People a Hearing — Attempt to Found a Negro College in New Haven — The Town Thrown into an Uproar — The Project Defeated — The Canterbury Disgrace — The Burleigh Brothers — Why Windham County is Republican, 112

VIII.

Mr. Garrison goes to England — His Arrival Opportune — British Emancipation — Exposure of the Colonization Scheme — Protest of Wilberforce and Others — Death of Wilberforce — Mr. Garrison Speaks in Exeter Hall — Writes to the London "Patriot" — Taken for a Negro by Buxton — George Thompson — His Mission to America and its Results — He Returns to England — Preparing to Form a National Society — Mrs. Child's Appeal — Phelps's Lectures on Slavery — Western Reserve College — President Storrs and Professors Green and Wright — Death of President Storrs — Mob in New York, 129

IX.

Formation of the American Anti-Slavery Society — Character and Spirit of the Convention — The Declaration of Sentiments Drafted by Garrison — Close of the Convention — The Society Begins its Work — Headquarters in New York — The First Anniversary — The Bible Society Tested and Found Wanting — Hostility of the Press — Attitude of the Churches — Apologies for Slavery — Mobs — Judge Jay — W. I. Emancipation, 147

X.

The Lane Theological Seminary — Arthur Tappan and Dr. Beecher — A Remarkable Class of Students — Discussion of the Slavery Question — Conversion of the Students to Abolitionism — Intense Excitement — The Students Become Missionaries — The Trustees Enact a Gag-Law — The Faculty Submits — Dr. Beecher Yields to Temptation and Goes into Eclipse — The Students Refuse the Gag and Ask for a Dismission — The Faculty in Self-Defence, etc., 156

XI.

Progress of the Cause — Madness of the Opposition — Southern Threats and Northern Menaces — Firmness of Arthur Tappan — Northern Colleges — Mutilation of Books — Beginning of a "Reign of Terror" — Movement of Conservatives in Boston — James G. Birney — Anti-Slavery Publications Sent to the South — Post-Office in Charleston Broken Open by a Mob — Pro-Slavery Demonstration in Boston — Mob of "Gentlemen of Property and Standing" — Garrison Dragged Through the Streets and Thrust into Jail — Dr. Channing's Tribute to the Abolitionists, 182

XII.

Effects of the Boston Mob — Francis Jackson's Bravery — Harriet Martineau — Mrs. Chapman and her Work — Mobs in Montpelier, Vt., and Utica, N. Y. — Gerrit Smith — Alvan Stewart — Burning of Pennsylvania Hall — Attempts to Put the Abolitionists Down by Law — Demands of the South — Gov. Everett — Prosecution of Dr. Crandall — Flogging of Amos Dresser — Requisition from the Governor of Alabama — Harsh Language, 203

XIII.

Persecution of James G. Birney — Press Destroyed — The Martyrdom of Lovejoy — Meeting in Faneuil Hall — Dr. Channing — Wendell Phillips — Edmund Quincy, 220

XIV.

Attitude of the Churches — Anti-Slavery Agitation among the Methodists — Persecution of Abolitionists — The Wesleyan Secession — The Division of 1844 — The Methodist Church a Type of Others — The Baptists — Orthodox Authorities — Old School Covenanters — The Free Presbyterians — The Quakers, 234

XV.

- Activity of Women — Example of England and Virginia — Mrs. Mott in the Convention of 1833 — Female Societies — Sarah and Angelina Grimké — Their Visit to New York — Their Labors in Massachusetts — The "Brookfield Bull" — Whittier's Poem — "Southside" Adams and Governor Wise, 254

XVI.

- The Woman Question — The New England Convention Admits Women — Mr. Garrison's "Heresies" — The Clerical Appeal — A Confession — Attempts to Narrow the Platform — Sectarian Assumptions — Whittier's Testimony — Catholicity of the Movement — The Peace Discussion and its Fruits — Attempt to Revolutionize the Massachusetts Society — A New Paper — "New Organization" — Mrs. Chapman's History, "Right and Wrong in Massachusetts," 271

XVII.

- The American Society in 1839 Admits Women — Strong Protest Against the Measure — Scheme for Rescinding the Action in 1840 — Struggle of the Two Parties — Transfer of "The Emancipator" — A Steamboat Excursion — The Admission of Women Confirmed — A Woman on the Business Committee — A New National Society — Its History — Its Decease — American Missionary Association — The Old Society — "National Anti-Slavery Standard" and its Editors — Garrison's Tribute to Arthur Tappan — John A. Collins — N. P. Rogers — Abby Kelley, . . . 286

XVIII.

- Formation of the Liberty Party — Complicated with "New Organization" — Mr. Garrison's Opposition, and the Reasons thereof — Samuel E. Sewall and John G. Whittier — Parties Limited by the Constitution — In Danger of Degenerating — Slavery Abolished by Southern Madness rather than by Northern Principle — Moral Agitation of Paramount Importance — Testimony of Frederick Douglass, 305

XIX.

- Explanatory and Apologetic — The Moral Agitation, its Instruments, Agents and Resources — Bad Effects of the Secession — The Garrisonians "Hold the Fort" — The Movement Still Formidable — Pennsylvania — The Western Society — Anti-Slavery Papers — Annexation of Texas — Theodore Parker — The Lecturing Agents — Rev. Samuel May — Stephen S. Foster — Parker Pillsbury, 316

XX.

The Question of Disunion — The Declaration of 1833 — The American Idol — The "Covenant with Death," and the "Agreement with Hell" — Dr. Channing's Opinion — "No Union with Slaveholders" — The Demoralizing Influence of the Constitution — The Claim that it was Anti-Slavery — John Quincy Adams's Opinion — Judge Jay in Favor of Disunion — Need of a Sound Ethical Basis — Political Effects of the Agitation — The Rebellion Changes the Issue — Mr. Garrison Vindicated, 334

XXI.

Mr. Garrison's Visits Abroad — The London Conference of 1840 — American Women Excluded — Mr. Garrison Refuses to be a Member — Excitement in England — O'Connell and Bowring — The Visit of 1846 — The Free Church of Scotland — The Visit of 1867 — The London Breakfast — John Bright — The Duke of Argyll — John Stuart Mill — Goldwin Smith — George Thompson — Speech of Mr. Garrison — The Visit of 1877 — Sight-seeing — Visits to Old Friends — Delectable Days — Farewells, . . . 349

XXII.

Mr. Garrison's Religious Opinions — Changes in Them — No Disturbance of the Foundations — The Charge of Infidelity — Mr. Garrison in Self-Defence — His Orthodoxy — His Christian Spirit — Purifying Effects of the Anti-Slavery Movement — Moral Influence of the Anti-Slavery Papers — Faith in Free Discussion — Spiritualism, 363

XXIII.

Subjects Omitted — The Absorbing Issue in Politics — The Moral Agitation More Intense than Ever — The Fugitive Slave Law — Webster's Apostasy — Trial of Castner Hanway — Anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society Invaded by a Mob — Driven from New York for Two Years — A Flying Leap — Lincoln's Administration — His Re-election — Mr. Garrison's Attitude — Visit to Charleston — Scenes and Incidents — Withdrawal from the American Anti-Slavery Society — Close of "The Liberator," 377

XXIV.

Mr. Garrison's Last Years — Tokens of Public Respect — His Activity in Reforms — His Power as a Public Speaker — His Modesty — His Hopefulness — His Private and Domestic Life — His Last Illness and Death — The Funeral Services, 393

ILLUSTRATIONS.

PORTRAIT OF MR. GARRISON,	Frontispiece.
MR. GARRISON'S BIRTHPLACE,	Page 25
THE BOSTON MOB OF 1835,	" 198
FAC-SIMILE OF "THE LIBERATOR" HEADING,	" 325
THE EMANCIPATION GROUP,	" 382
MR. GARRISON'S LATE RESIDENCE,	" 398

GARRISON AND HIS TIMES.

I.

Preliminary — The Revolutionary Period — The Quakers — Benjamin Lundy — The Hour and the Man — Birth and Boyhood of Garrison — He Learns the Trade of a Printer — Becomes a Writer and an Editor — In Boston and Bennington — Joins Lundy in Baltimore — His Imprisonment.

THE abolition of slavery in the United States is an event of the past, and the generation now coming upon the stage will know no more of the struggles it cost, or of the men and women by whose toils and sacrifices it was brought about than can be found in a chapter of history but imperfectly written as yet, or than they may be able to gather from the private recollections of the now venerable actors who are rapidly disappearing from the field on which their triumphs were won. The war in which the great conflict was brought to its final culmination, and in which such mighty moral and material forces were engaged, will be duly celebrated in history; but the moral and political agitations that preceded and led up to that event, and the men and women who took a conspicuous and honorable part therein, are not so likely to receive from posterity the tribute due to their courageous devotion to the cause of justice and liberty. The lines of this picture are growing fainter day by day, and soon every hand that can retouch them will be mouldering in the dust. As one who took a constant, though modest part in those agitations, from their feeble beginning to their triumphant conclusion, I have undertaken to give the public the benefit of some of my recollections of the events of that time, and of the actors therein.

All great changes in human affairs spring from causes whose workings may be traced, with more or less distinctness, to a remote past. Slavery being a very ancient institution, it was not left to America to make the first protest against it. There was not, and there could not be any originality in the American Anti-Slavery movement. The principles involved were as old as humanity itself, and had their champions and martyrs long before the discovery of the New World. During the colonial period of our history, and for some years after the adoption of the Constitution, there was a strong current of opposition to slavery. The discussions that preceded the Revolutionary War, involving as they did the fundamental principles of human liberty, could not but remind all thoughtful persons of the guilt and shame of slaveholding. The Declaration of Independence, though adopted for no such purpose, virtually set the seal of condemnation upon slavery as a system at war with human nature and the law of God. In lifting up that beacon-light before the world, the American people challenged the judgment of mankind upon their shameful inconsistency in making merchandise of human flesh. The sting of "the world's reproach around them burning" was keenly felt by many of the most eminent statesmen, divines and phil-anthropists of that day. Franklin, Rush, Hamilton and Jay; Hopkins, Edwards and Stiles; and Woolman, Lay and Benezet, among the Quakers, deserve honorable mention for their sturdy and unyielding hostility to slavery. To the credit of the Quakers as a body it should be said, that as early as 1780, after a long and serious contest, they emancipated all their slaves, which were very numerous in Maryland, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, one monthly meeting setting free eleven hundred. They also refused to hire slave-labor of the masters.

In a certain sense the Abolitionists of a later period entered into and completed the labors of these noble and far-seeing men. But I am not to write a history of the introduction of slavery into this country, nor to record the efforts of some of the founders of the Republic to resist its encroachments. I set my stake at the beginning of the later movement against slavery, which, dating from 1829, went forward with constantly increasing momentum until the fetters of the slave were melted in the hot flames of war. At the date above mentioned there was hardly a ripple of excitement about slavery in any part of the nation. The fathers of the Republic had fallen asleep; the Anti-Slavery sentiment of the country, defeated in the spasmodic Missouri struggle in 1821, had become too feeble to utter even a whisper. From one year's end to another there was scarcely a newspaper in all the land that made the slightest allusion to the subject. The Abolition societies in which Franklin and Rush and Jay were once so active were either dead or sleeping. One voice there was, and one only. Need I say that was the voice of a Quaker? It was Benjamin Lundy, who, in his little paper with a great name, — "The Genius of Universal Emancipation," — lifted up that "voice crying in the wilderness," first in Ohio, next in Tennessee, and subsequently in Baltimore, then a mart of the domestic traffic in slaves. It was a brave and an earnest voice, but it was scarcely heard outside of the Quaker body, to which Mr. Lundy belonged, and which was fast becoming almost as torpid as other religious bodies on this question. There was a time, as some one has said, when one Quaker was enough to shake the country for twenty miles around; but the time came at length when it required the whole country for twenty miles around to shake one Quaker! The cotton traffic had become immensely profitable, and Quakers in the great cities loved its gains as well as others. The still, small voice of conscience was overwhelmed by the hoarse clamors of avarice. It was a universally accepted proverb that slavery was absolutely necessary to the production of a staple that was filling the coffers of Northern merchants and manufacturers with untold wealth. The moral sense of the people of the North became paralyzed. Pulpit and press were generally silent. If they spoke at all it was only to say that slavery was too dangerous a subject to be discussed — that the Union would not long survive its agitation. To Benjamin Lundy chiefly belongs the honor of keeping the flame of Anti-Slavery sentiment from utterly dying out in those dark days, and putting the burning torch of liberty into the hands of the man raised up by Providence to lead the new crusade against the Slave Power.

No careful student of history can fail to be struck by the fact that in every crisis of human affairs men have been raised up with special qualifications for the work that needed to be done at that particular time. The hour strikes for the achievement of a great reform, and lo! a man appears upon the stage, commissioned and equipped of God for the task. He gives the keynote for rallying thousands; he sounds the charge against an iniquitous institution, mighty in aspect, but ripening for destruction. He calls a nation to repentance for its crimes against humanity, and warns it of the Divine retributions for sin. Such men are the prophets of God in their generation — misrepresented, persecuted, maligned, and sometimes slain; but always honored of God, and sure at last to be honored of men. What a catalogue of such men, "of whom the world was not worthy," might be culled from the pages of history — men whose bloody footsteps are the way-marks of human progress, and to whom, under God, we owe what is most valuable in our civilization, and most beneficent in the application of Christianity to society and its institutions.

One of the greatest of all this host, the prophet of one of the grandest reforms that the world has ever witnessed, was the man whose labors and achievements will find a partial record in these pages. It is not any clearer to me that Moses was commissioned to lead the children of Israel out of the house of bondage, that Elijah was sent of God to rebuke the iniquity of Ahab, or that Jesus of Nazareth (I speak with reverence) came into the world to "bear witness unto the truth," than it is that Mr. Garrison was raised up by Divine Providence to deliver this Republic from the sin and crime of slavery. The circumstances of his appearance were remarkable. The nation was fast asleep, and heard not the rumblings of the earthquake that threatened her destruction. The state was morally paralyzed; the pulpit was dumb; the church heeded not the cry of the slave. Commerce, greedy of gain, piled her hoards by the unpaid toil of the bondman. Judgment was turned away backward; Justice stood afar off; Truth was fallen in the street, and Equity could not enter. The hands of the people were defiled with blood, their fingers with iniquity; their lips spoke lies, their tongues muttered perverseness. Men talked of slavery in that day (when they talked at all) with an incoherency like that of Bedlam, with a moral blindness and perverseness like that of Sodom and Gomorrah. That in this hour of thick darkness a voice was heard pleading, trumpet-tongued, for immediate emancipation, as the duty of every master and the right of every slave, seems to us now one of the most signal illustrations of the immanence of God in human affairs. I must believe that that voice, crying in the wilderness and calling the people to repentance, was divinely inspired — not, indeed, in a miraculous, but certainly in a providential sense. It spoke for God's outraged law of justice and love. It pleaded for the inalienable rights of man. It rebuked a sin that was preying upon the nation's life.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON was born in Newburyport, Mass., in a house still standing in close proximity to the church, under whose pulpit repose the remains of George Whitefield, on the 10th of December, 1805. His father was a sea-captain from New Brunswick, and a man of some literary ability and ambition. His mother was a deeply religious woman — a Baptist, when to be such required no small amount of moral courage. The son inherited the mother's intuitive reverence for God and for human nature as his image, her fine moral and spiritual sensitiveness, and her abhorrence of oppression in all its forms. As a boy he was responsive to those sentiments of liberty and patriotism which pervaded the political and social atmosphere of the time. His opinions upon every question affecting the public welfare rested upon the solid basis of the Divine Law. Ethical considerations in his mind outweighed all others, and any compromise with an unjust or oppressive institution was, in his eyes, a sin to be rebuked and denounced. His clear moral vision, penetrating at once all the subterfuges of the champions and apologists of slavery, enabled him to discern the true character of the system, and to depict it in language that stirred the consciences and moved the hearts of those who read or listened.

Mrs. Garrison, while her son was yet too small to support comfortably the weight of the lapstone, set him to learning the trade of a shoemaker. As he was unhappy in this occupation, she next apprenticed him to a cabinet-maker. But he was still discontented, yearning continually for an occupation more congenial to his feelings and tastes, and his articles of apprenticeship were cancelled at his own earnest request. He found, at length, his right place in a printing-office in his native town. This proved for him both high school and college, from which he graduated with honor after a long and faithful apprenticeship. During the period of his minority he became deeply interested in current moral and political questions, upon which he wrote frequently and acceptably for the newspaper on which he daily worked as a printer, "The Newburyport Herald." He also contributed to a Boston paper a series of political essays, which, being anonymous, were by many attributed to the Hon. Timothy Pickering, then one of the most eminent citizens of Massachusetts. At the end of his apprenticeship he became the editor of a new paper, "The Free Press," in his native place. It was distinguished for its high moral tone, but proved unremunerative, as such papers generally do. He was next heard of as editor of "The National Philanthropist," in Boston, the first paper ever established to support the doctrine of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks. The theme was congenial to him, and he discussed it with great earnestness and ability. The motto of the paper was his own. It expressed a great truth in these words: "Moderate drinking is the down-hill road to drunkenness." This was in 1827-28. While engaged upon this paper he made the acquaintance of Benjamin Lundy, who came to Boston for the purpose of interesting some of the people of that city in the question of slavery.

BIRTHPLACE OF WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, NEWBURYPORT, MASS.

Sometime in 1828 Mr. Garrison accepted an invitation to go to Bennington, Vt., to establish a paper for the support of John Quincy Adams for the Presidency. The title of this paper was "The Journal of the Times." As a boy, I had greatly admired "The National Philanthropist," and had tried my own 'prentice hand as a writer in its columns. But I found new cause for admiring "The Journal of the Times" in the fact that it was published in my native State. How eagerly did I read and file away for preservation every number as it came to the office in which I was serving my own apprenticeship — "The Watchman" office in Montpelier. It was to me the ideal newspaper, and it stirred in me that ambition of editorship which springs up in the breast of every boy who learns to handle a composing-stick. Mr. Garrison did not neglect the purpose for which his paper was established. He supported Mr. Adams with zeal and ability, but he also discussed questions of reform which were quite distasteful to some of his readers. He was the champion of temperance and peace, and Lundy's "Genius of Universal Emancipation," which was among his exchanges, fanned his instinctive hatred of slavery to an intense heat. He wrote a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, which he sent to all the postmasters in the State of Vermont, begging them to procure signatures thereto. In that day postmasters enjoyed the privilege of receiving and sending letters free of postage, and Mr. Garrison succeeded in getting a large number of signatures to his petition, which caused quite a flutter in Congress.

Mr. Lundy's paper was a small sheet, published but once a month. He spent the greater portion of his time in travelling from place to place procuring subscribers and endeavoring to excite an interest in the subject by conversation and lecturing. In some instances he carried the head-rules, column-rules and subscription book of his paper with him, and when he came to a town where he found a printing-office, he would stop long enough to print and mail a number of "The Genius." He travelled for the most part on foot, carrying a heavy pack. He was a man of slight figure, though of a wiry temperament, and these exertions no doubt overtaxed his strength. In his boyhood he had seen coffles of Virginia slaves going down the Ohio on their way to the far South, and his Quaker education had so intensified his hatred of the slave system that he counted no labor or sacrifice on his part too great to be endured in efforts for its suppression. No apostle of the Christian faith ever exhibited a more ardent and unselfish devotion to his work than that which characterized the anti-slavery labors of this devoted but simple-minded Quaker, who obeyed the rule of his sect in "minding the light" of the Divine Spirit in his own soul. The torch of liberty which Mr. Garrison was holding aloft in the Green Mountains of Vermont naturally attracted his attention and kindled a new hope in his bosom. His heart yearned toward the young champion of freedom, and he longed to enlist him more fully in the cause — to make him, if it were possible, his coadjutor. After making the journey to Boston by stage, he walked, staff in hand and pack on back, in the winter snow, all the long and weary way from that city to Bennington. The meeting of these two men under the shadow of the Green Mountains, whose winds were ever the swift messengers of freedom, may be regarded as the beginning of a movement that was destined, under God, to work the overthrow of American slavery. In this fresh mountain-spring originated the moral influences which, feeble at the first, became at length too mighty to be resisted. The two men took sweet and solemn counsel together, and formed a resolution whose final results were seen in the deliverance of their country from slavery, and proclaimed in the exultant shouts of millions of emancipated bondmen. The immediate result of the conference was that Mr. Garrison agreed to join Mr. Lundy in Baltimore. He went there accordingly in the fall of 1829, and took the principal charge of "The Genius of Universal Emancipation," which was enlarged, and from that time issued weekly. Mr. Lundy, it was understood, would contribute to the editorial columns so far as he could while spending most of his time in lecturing and soliciting subscriptions. Never was a partnership entered upon for a holier purpose or in a more fraternal spirit. And yet, from the outset, there was between the two men a wide difference of opinion upon one fundamental point. Mr. Lundy's conviction of the wrong and sinfulness of slavery was as deep and earnest as that of Mr. Garrison, but he was an advocate of gradual emancipation, while his mind was preoccupied with schemes for colonizing the slaves as fast as they should be set free. Mr. Garrison, on the other hand, from the moment of setting himself to the serious consideration of the subject, saw clearly that gradualism was a delusion and a snare. Slavery was either right or wrong in principle, as well as in practice. If it was right even for an hour, it might be so for a year, for a century, or to the end of time; and, therefore, any effort for its abolition would be a war upon Divine Providence. If it was wrong, it was so upon the instant and in the nature of things; and, therefore, there could be no excuse for its continuance for a day or even an hour. All this seemed as clear to him as any mathematical axiom, and as fundamental as the law of Divine justice. His experience in the temperance cause had taught him that any movement against a wrong custom or an unrighteous institution, if it was to be of much avail, must rest upon some clearly defined moral principle which would commend itself instantly to the popular apprehension as a self-evident truth.

It was this clear moral perception of Mr. Garrison, which, penetrating through all the subterfuges in which slavery had become entrenched, qualified him to lead the great movement to which he was henceforth to be devoted. It was only in being himself lifted up to this high plane of moral principle, that he could hope to draw his fellow-countrymen into sympathy with the movement, or even to arrest their attention for more than a fleeting hour. To spend his time in depicting the cruelties of the slave system, while tacitly consenting to the casuistry by which its existence for the time was excused, would be such a process of self-stultification as inevitably to defeat the object he had in view.

Mr. Garrison explained his views to Mr. Lundy with the utmost frankness, and they talked the matter over without coming to an agreement. How were the two men in the face of this difference to walk together? Mr. Lundy, in his sweet Quaker way, solved the difficulty. He said to Mr. Garrison: "Well, thee may put thy initials to thy articles, and I will put my initials to mine, and each will bear his own burden." And so the two men struck hands, and "The Genius of Universal Emancipation" was a paper with two voices, but one was a voice of thunder, while the other sunk almost to a whisper. Up to this time the paper had made little impression upon public sentiment. Its readers wept over the wrongs and cruelties of slavery, but they thought that a sudden emancipation would be attended with still worse evils; and so, while they pitied the slave, they excused the masters, and made no intelligent and well directed assault upon the system. The chief sin of slavery they assigned to its guilty originators; the duty of repentance and emancipation was postponed to an indefinite future. In the nature of things the holders of slaves could see little ground for alarm in an anti-slavery sentiment so unintelligent and blind as this. But when Mr. Garrison lifted up the standard of Immediate Emancipation, the ears of the slaveholders of Maryland and Virginia began to tingle. Under Mr. Lundy's exposures of the cruelties of the system they had indeed been annoyed and angry ; but the sight of that banner of Immediate Emancipation filled them with alarm for the safety of their system. For the first time they heard their right to keep even one slave in bondage for a single hour disputed. They were told that by every principle of justice and by the law of God it was their duty to "break every yoke and let the oppressed go free." All the excuses and subterfuges by which they had stifled the voice of conscience were swept away by an invincible logic, and they saw themselves arraigned before the Nation as a body of oppressors.

Baltimore was not only a slave-holding city, but one of the chief marts of the domestic traffic in slaves. Slave-pens flaunted their signs in open day upon the principal streets, and their wealthy owners moved in the best society and occupied pews in Christian churches. Vessels loaded with slaves, torn from their kindred and friends in Maryland and Virginia, were constantly departing for Mobile, Savannah, New Orleans and other Southern ports ; and coffles of slaves, chained together, often moved in sad procession, sometimes to mocking strains of music, through the streets out into the open country, on their way to the National Capital. The state of society in which scenes like these were tolerated need not be described. And yet it was in this seat of the domestic slave-trade that Lundy and Garrison set up their anti-slavery banner. Their friends, of course, were few and very timid, and ready to run under cover at the first alarm. Slavery was indeed acknowledged to be a bad system, leading to many gross wrongs and cruelties. Even the slaveholders generally admitted as much as this. But emancipation was held even by the sincere opponents of slavery to be impracticable. The holder of slaves was declared to be in the position of a man having a wolf by the ears — he must hold on to save his own life. The slaves, if emancipated, would take revenge for past wrongs by cutting the throats of the masters, burning their houses and ravaging the land. They could not take care of themselves in a state of freedom, and in fact did not desire to be free. In this sort of sophistry and falsehood the common-sense and the conscience of the whole community were enmeshed. Emancipation in any shape, however gradual, was held to be an impossibility; the very thought of immediate emancipation the wildest fanatical dream; and even the discussion of the subject was dreaded as a knell of doom to the Republic itself.

We need not wonder, therefore, if "The Genius of Universal Emancipation," which as a small monthly under Mr. Lundy's mild management had been barely tolerated, was now, in its enlarged form and issued every week, absolutely intolerable to the people of Baltimore and the surrounding region. The slave power, entrenched in church and state, began to growl like a wild beast at bay. The air was thick with fierce denunciation of "that madcap Garrison," and men in places of power and influence began to look each other in the face and ask whereunto this new crusade against slavery would grow if some means of crushing it out were not speedily found. The slaveholders hardly dared then to make open war upon the freedom of the press, lest in doing so they should arouse an enemy too strong to be successfully resisted. They contented themselves, therefore, with exciting a popular clamor against the obnoxious paper, under which the more timid of its subscribers fell away. Mr. Garrison himself says: "My doctrine of immediate emancipation so alarmed and excited the people everywhere, that where friend Lundy would get one new subscriber I would knock a dozen off. It was the old experiment of the frog in the well, that went up two feet and fell back three at every jump." Men who could see only half-truths and lacked courage to maintain even those with firmness, said: "How foolish to throw away all chance of doing any good by such ultraism." But Wisdom then, as always, was justified of her children. The excitement by which the slaveholders hoped to extinguish the rising tide of anti-slavery sentiment only served to fan it to an intense flame, and more was done in a single month to prepare the way for the new crusade than could have been accomplished by years of timid, half-way effort. It was no confused or uncertain sound that the new tocsin rang out upon the air. It proclaimed slavery a sin and shame, and demanded that every yoke should be broken, every fetter sundered, every captive set free. It startled and aroused thousands who would have been deaf to any more equivocal message, and kindled in the hearts of a noble few a fixed determination to cry aloud and spare not until slavery should be utterly abolished.

It was not long, however, before the slaveholders of Baltimore found what they thought was an opportunity to crush out the new movement and the paper that represented it. Mr. Garrison, of course, did not fail to denounce the domestic slave-trade, of which Baltimore was one of the principal marts. There came to that port a vessel owned by Mr. Francis Todd of Newburyport, Mr. Garrison's native place, and commanded by one of her citizens, named Brown. The vessel took from Baltimore to New Orleans a cargo of eighty slaves. Here was a case of Northern complicity with the infamous traffic which stirred Mr. Garrison's deepest indignation, and he denounced the transaction as in no respect different in principle from taking a cargo of human flesh on the coast of Africa and carrying it across the ocean to a market. The law denounced the foreign slave-trade as piracy; the domestic slave-trade, in the sight of God and according to every principle of justice, was no whit better, nor in any respect different in quality. Mr. Todd, stung to the quick by Mr. Garrison's denunciations, brought suit against him for libel. A trial in a slaveholding court and before a slaveholding jury could have but one result. Mr. Garrison was found guilty and fined in the sum of fifty dollars and costs of court. If he had been a rich man he probably would not have consented to pay a single cent of the sum demanded of him. But he was too poor to pay, and so of necessity went to jail. There was no effort on the part of the patrons of "The Genius" to avert his fate. The excitement in Baltimore was almost as intense as that in Jerusalem when Jesus was led away to be crucified. "And they all forsook him and fled" was hardly more true in the one case than in the other of those who before had professed to be friendly to the cause and its champion. But the young Abolitionist was neither cast down nor dismayed, nor did he for a moment waver in his adherence to the principles he had avowed. He would make no apology, nor retract a single word. He knew that the ultimate effect of his imprisonment would be to arouse popular hostility to slavery, and promote the cause of emancipation. His undaunted spirit found utterance in two sonnets, which he inscribed with a pencil on the walls of his cell, as follows:—

THE GUILTLSS PRISONER.

Prisoner! within these gloomy walls close pent,
 Guiltless of horrid crime or vena! wrong—
 Bear nobly up against thy punishment,
 And in thy innocence be great and strong!
 Perchance thy fault was love to all mankind;
 Thou didst oppose some vile, oppressive law;
 Or strive all human fetters to unbind;
 Or wouldst not bear the implements of war:—
 What then? Dost thou so soon repent the deed?
 A martyr's crown is richer than a king's!
 Think it an honor with thy Lord to bleed,
 And glory midst intensest sufferings!
 Though beat, imprisoned, put to open shame,
 Time shall embalm and magnify thy name!

FREEDOM OF THE MIND.

High walls and huge the BODY may confine,
And iron grates obstruct the prisoner's gaze,
And massive bolts may baffle his design,
And vigilant keepers watch his devious ways :
Yet scorns th' immortal MIND this base control!
No chains can bind it and no cell inclose :
Swifter than light, it flies from pole to pole,
And, in a flash, from earth to heaven it goes !
It leaps from mount to mount—from vale to vale
It wanders, plucking honeyed fruits and flowers ;
It visits home, to hear the fireside tale,
Or in sweet converse pass the joyous hours :
'Tis up before the sun, roaming afar,
And, in its watches, wearies every star !

II.

Garrison's Imprisonment, and Its Effects at the North—The Release—Whittier, Clay, Tappan—Partnership of Lundy and Garrison Dissolved—Tribute of the Latter to the Former—Founding of "The Liberator" in Boston rather than in Washington—Garrison on a Lecturing Tour—Boston and the Cotton Traffic—Garrison Appeals in Vain to the Clergy—Dr. Lyman Beecher and Jeremiah Evarts—"The Liberator" Born in a Dark Time—Purposes and Hopes of its Founder—Responsibility of the Church.

THE news of Mr. Garrison's imprisonment was received with fierce exultation at the South, while many Northern people openly said: "It is just what he deserves; a man so reckless of the public welfare as to attempt to stir up an excitement on the slavery question ought to be brought up with a round turn." The expressions of mild indignation and sympathy that found utterance here and there were qualified by regrets that a man engaged in so good a cause should be so wild and fanatical as to demand the instant emancipation of the slaves. "The Boston Courier," edited by that famous journalist, Joseph T. Buckingham, a man of singular independence of spirit, while not approving Mr. Garrison's views and methods, did yet appreciate his unselfish devotion to liberty and his willingness to suffer in a good cause. It published the sonnets which he inscribed on the walls of his cell, and, if my recollection is not at fault, printed one or two letters from him, written during his imprisonment. I was then in Boston, and full of a boy's enthusiasm for my hero, whom I had never seen, but had admired from the time of his connection with "The National Philanthropist." I was often a visitor at a Cornhill book-store, which was a place of resort for the orthodox clergymen of Boston, including my own pastor, the Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher. Newspapers, religious and secular, were on file there for the accommodation of visitors, and at times conversation was free upon topics of public interest. Well do I remember the discussions in that circle of Mr. Garrison's imprisonment, and how few of all those who took part in them expressed more than a qualified sympathy for the prisoner, while most of them spoke of him as a visionary and a fanatic. Indeed, the whole community seemed to be far more deeply impressed by what they thought the fanaticism of the new champion of the slave than by the injustice and shame of imprisoning a man for a too ardent devotion to liberty.

But the discussion thus excited in different parts of the country, though lacking in a true appreciation of the crisis, exerted a wholesome influence, and prepared the way for the growth of a more enlightened public sentiment. Expediency was a very popular word in those days, being held to embody the very highest wisdom in all things relating to slavery. Everybody was ready to affirm that "slavery in the abstract" was something dreadful, the very acme, indeed, of human wickedness; but for slavery in the United States every man's mouth was full of apologies. Texts of Scripture were cited for its defence as freely as if it had been the very corner-stone of the Christian faith, and the Constitution of the United States was appealed to as the very charter and bulwark of the hateful system. At the bottom of all the wretched casuistry by which men silenced the demands of justice in their hearts, was this one fact — the slaves were black; or, to use the word more deeply freighted with atheistic contempt of human nature than any other, "niggers." If, by a miracle, the slaves had been made white, all excuses for slavery would have been overthrown, and the whole people would have risen up as one man to demand its instant abolition. Gradualism in that case would have become intolerable, and immediate emancipation the popular cry. Mr. Garrison's primary fault was his belief in the absolute humanity of the negro; but this was just what fitted him for the work to which he was called of God, and that made his appeals to the consciences of men so powerful.

The story of his release, after an imprisonment of forty-nine days, is of almost romantic interest. John G. Whittier, then unknown to fame, was the editor of "The New England Review," at Hartford, having succeeded the late George D. Prentice, who was called by the friends of Henry Clay to become the editor of "The Louisville Daily Journal." Whittier and Garrison were not unknown to each other. When the latter was editing "The Free Press," at Newburyport, the former had sent to him for publication several of his earliest poems, in which Mr. Garrison saw indications of the genius now universally recognized. Educated in all the best principles and traditions of Quakerism, there was even then burning in his heart that love of freedom which subsequently burst forth in impassioned verse. He was deeply moved by the imprisonment of his friend, and naturally anxious to do what he could for his deliverance. He was a great admirer of Henry Clay, and cherished the hope that he might one day become President. Of course, he knew that Mr. Clay was a slaveholder, but he had faith in him as at heart a true friend of freedom, for he had observed his efforts to provide for the ultimate abolition of slavery in Kentucky, and admired his eloquent defence of the Greeks in their struggle for freedom. He wrote to the Kentucky statesman, asking his interposition in behalf of the "guiltless prisoner" at Baltimore, and begging him to open his prison-door by paying his fine. Mr. Clay responded promptly, making some preliminary inquiries which indicated a purpose to comply with Whittier's request. This appears all the more creditable to him when it is remembered that Mr. Garrison was an opponent of the scheme of African colonization, of which Mr. Clay was then the foremost champion, and had sharply criticised some of his speeches on that subject. The Kentucky statesman, though he doubtless had little patience with Mr. Garrison's doctrine of immediate emancipation, was not then wholly devoid of a noble though blind ambition to connect his name in some way with the deliverance of his country from slavery. If he had been told at that moment what he would do, ere the lapse of many years, as a candidate for the Presidency, to promote the schemes of the Slave Power, he would doubtless have said: "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" While Mr. Clay was probably getting ready to do what Mr. Whittier had recommended, another stepped in before him, paid the prisoner's fine and bill of costs, and thus opened his prison-door. It was Arthur Tappan, then a prosperous merchant of New York, who seized the laurel that might otherwise have adorned the brow of the great Compromiser of Kentucky. Mr. Tappan was a reader of "The Genius of Universal Emancipation," and thus familiar with Mr. Garrison's views. Like Mr. Clay, he was a Colonizationist, and little inclined to sanction what was then regarded as ultraism in dealing with slavery. He did, however, admire Mr. Garrison's independence and courage, his loyalty to God and his devotion to freedom, and was willing to take upon himself the odium of setting the "fanatic" at liberty.

The partnership between Mr. Lundy and Mr. Garrison, which had been interrupted by the imprisonment of the latter, was now formally dissolved by mutual consent, and with the most fraternal feelings on both sides. "The Genius" fell back from a weekly to a monthly publication, under Mr. Lundy's exclusive control, while Mr. Garrison took measures to establish a journal of his own, in which, upon his sole responsibility, he could deal with the slavery question according to his own convictions and his matured judgment. Never, however, did he cease to admire the indomitable courage and devotion of Lundy, or forget to be grateful to him as the man who first called his attention to the wrongs and woes of slavery. It was not long afterward that his admiration and gratitude found utterance in the following lines : —

TO BENJAMIN LUNDY.

Self-taught, unaided, poor, reviled, contemned,
 Beset with enemies, by friends betrayed;
 As madman and fanatic oft condemned,
 Yet in thy noble cause still undismayed!
 Leonidas could not thy courage boast;
 Less numerous were his foes, his band more strong:
 Alone, unto a more than Persian host,
 Thou hast undauntedly given battle long.
 Nor shalt thou singly wage the unequal strife;
 Unto thy aid, with spear and shield, I rush,
 And freely do I offer up my life,
 And bid my heart's-blood find a wound to gush!
 New volunteers are trooping to the field;
 To die we are prepared, BUT NOT AN INCH TO YIELD!

For several years Mr. Lundy went on in his old way, exposing the wrongs of slavery, advocating gradual emancipation, and busying himself, with small success, in various schemes for colonizing the negroes, until the moral agitation created by the more uncompromising efforts of Garrison drew him with thousands of others into its mighty wake.

Mr. Garrison at first resolved to unfurl the standard of Immediate Emancipation at the National Capital, the seat of the domestic slave-trade and of those mighty political influences by means of which the Slave Power dominated over the Republic. In August, 1830, he issued the prospectus of a weekly paper to be published in Washington, and called "The Liberator." The proposition was as natural as it was bold. Certainly it was most appropriate that a public journal intended to promote the deliverance of the nation from the crime and curse of human bondage should be published in Washington, and sent forth from that centre to every part of the United States. It was then supposed that emancipation would find at least a few firm friends at the South, and that it would be possible to organize there a movement, which, appealing to the consciences of the slaveholders, would soon become formidable enough to work the overthrow of slavery. Such thoughts and expectations, however, were founded in a mistaken estimate of the power as well as the purposes of the supporters of slavery, who were ready, if necessary for the defence of their system, to deny the freedom of speech, and establish a reign of terror throughout the South.

Having issued his prospectus, Mr. Garrison soon left Baltimore for the North, where he hoped to find sympathy and support among his old friends, and in the community generally. Of course, he had no capital of his own on which to found the proposed paper. His only possessions were his indomitable courage and will, his ardent love of liberty, his faith in human nature, and his trust in God. But these were enough, and without a doubt of the goodness of his cause and of its early triumph, he went forth to battle in its behalf. During his imprisonment he had prepared several lectures on the subject of slavery and the delusive scheme of African colonization, and these he proposed to deliver in Northern cities and towns where he could gain a hearing. He first visited Philadelphia, where he was warmly received by the free people of color and by a few others, mostly Quakers; but he was unable to make any wide or deep impression upon the citizens generally, for Philadelphia then, and for many years afterwards, was intensely Southern in her interests and sympathies. His experiences in New York were hardly more favorable. Here, however, he met for the first time his benefactor, the man who had opened his prison-door, Mr. Arthur Tappan, who from that hour became his warm friend and supporter. The colored people of the city welcomed him as a hero, but the white people for the most part were hostile or apathetic. From New York he went on to New England—to New Haven, Hartford, Providence, Boston—where his reception was hardly more encouraging than it had been in places further south. In view of such a state of public sentiment in the free States, he soon became convinced that Boston rather than Washington was the place where "The Liberator" should be established, and he changed his plans accordingly. To fight slavery at the South while the North was hostile would be like going into battle in an enemy's country with no base for re-enforcements or supplies. It would be in vain to appeal against slavery to Richmond, Charleston and New Orleans, while Boston, New York and Philadelphia were apologizing for the system; in vain to seek the support of Southern statesmen while those of the North were hostile; in vain to look for sympathy to the Southern churches while those of the North were either apathetic or lending an open support to the evil. Writing on this subject, he said:—

“During my recent tour for the purpose of exciting the minds of the people by a series of discourses on the subject of slavery, every place that I visited gave fresh evidence of the fact that a greater revolution in public sentiment was to be effected in the free States—and particularly in New England—than at the South. I found contempt more bitter, opposition more active, detraction more relentless, prejudice more stubborn and apathy more frozen than among slave-owners themselves. Of course there were individual exceptions to the contrary. This state of things afflicted, but did not dishearten me. I determined, at every hazard, to lift up the standard of emancipation in the eyes of the nation, within sight of Bunker Hill, and in the birth-place of Liberty."

The resolution thus formed was an illustration of the hard common-sense for which he was ever afterwards distinguished. He saw that Washington was too near the fulcrum to afford the requisite purchase — he must throw his weight upon the end of the lever. A battle must first be fought to establish the right to discuss the subject of slavery, and this contest, in the then inflammable condition of the Southern mind, could not be successfully waged upon slave soil. The slaveholders would be certain to take alarm from the establishment of an uncompromising anti-slavery journal at the National Capital, and to suppress it with a strong hand; while the people of the North, in their indifference and blindness, would be almost sure to say, "Served him right; if he had not been a mad-cap, he would no more have established his incendiary sheet on slave soil than he would have walked into a powder magazine with a lighted torch." And yet the very people who would have said this, when they saw the first number of "The Liberator" with a Boston imprint, exclaimed: "Coward! Why does he not go to the South, instead of assailing slavery at this safe distance? The people of New England are not slaveholders, and this fanatic has no right to pester us with this perplexing question." But Mr. Garrison's clear-sightedness enabled him to discern, even at that early day, that the influences which chiefly sustained slavery were supplied by the people of the North. He clearly saw that all efforts to redeem the South would be vain so long as the Northern people, through ecclesiastical, political, commercial and social channels, supplied the moral power by which the slave system was upheld.

Boston was then the heart of New England, and spoke for it far more emphatically than she does now. The cotton traffic had grown to gigantic proportions there, and by it men gained vast wealth. Cotton factories were springing up on every side, giving profitable employment to large numbers of men, women and children, and by opening extensive markets for agricultural produce, enabling the farmers to pay off their mortgages and redeem themselves from the slavery of debt. The cotton traffic, in short, was regarded as the chief source of New England's prosperity, and the people were impatient of everything that seemed likely to disturb it. It was almost universally believed that cotton could be raised only by the labor of slaves, as no freeman would submit to the hardships necessarily involved in its culture. The appearance of "The Liberator" consequently set the whole cotton interest into a fever of excitement. Southern planters, filled with rage, wrote to their Northern customers protesting against such a paper, as calculated to excite the slaves to insurrection and deluge the South in blood. Northern merchants, yielding readily to such appeals to their cupidity and their fears, cried out against the anti-slavery movement as a wicked and inexcusable conspiracy. The press was their willing servant, and so to a great extent was the pulpit, especially in the cities and larger towns. These merchants occupied the most prominent pews in the churches, and contributed largely and liberally for the support of the ministry and for those missionary and other benevolent organizations that enjoyed the favor of the churches. The pulpit was thus sorely tempted to swerve from the laws of humanity and rectitude and become the apologist if not the defender of slavery. When I say that it often yielded to this temptation, or, where it did not fully yield, was seduced into a scarcely less guilty silence, I set down naught in malice, but only record the truth of history for the instruction and warning of other generations. If this truth were hidden, it would be impossible to estimate aright the courage, foresight and self-sacrificing spirit of Mr. Garrison and his associates.

Dr. Lyman Beecher was then at the head of the Orthodox pulpit in Boston. The great controversy between Orthodoxy and Unitarianism was drawing nigh to its culmination in the complete divorcement of the two parties. Dr. Channing, the leader on the Unitarian side, was a man of a gentle and humane spirit, not liking controversy, while Dr. Beecher was a born belligerent. Mr. Garrison was conscientiously and strictly Orthodox, and therefore naturally inclined to seek support in the first instance from the Orthodox pulpit and church. When he was in Boston in 1828, editing "The National Philanthropist," he became a warm admirer of Dr. Beecher, partly on account of his attitude on the Temperance question, but still more because of his great powers as a preacher, and, naturally enough, he was the first minister to whom Mr. Garrison appealed for support. He was bitterly disappointed in finding him indifferent to the appeal. "I have too many irons in the fire already," said the Doctor. "Then," said Mr. Garrison, solemnly, "you had better let all your irons burn than neglect your duty to the slave." The Doctor, like almost all the clergymen of that day, was a colonizationist, believing that freedom to the slaves with liberty to remain in the United States would be a curse; they must be sent to Africa, whence their fathers had been stolen, and carry to that country the Christianity of their masters. To him, therefore, Mr. Garrison's doctrine of immediate emancipation upon American soil was repulsive, and he told him so. "Your zeal," he said, "is commendable; but you are misguided. If you will give up your fanatical notions and be guided by us (the clergy) we will make you the Wilberforce of America."

Mr. Garrison had learned the doctrine of immediatism from Dr. Beecher himself. The very keynote of the revivals of that day, in which the Doctor took so prominent a part, was the duty of every sinner to repent instantly and give his heart to Christ; but the men who were most eloquent in urging this doctrine in its application to the sin of unbelief were prompt to deny it in its application to the sin of slavery. Sin in general was something for which there could be no apology or excuse, but the particular sin of treating men as chattels and compelling them to work without wages could only be put away, if at all, by a process requiring whole generations for its consummation! Such was the moral blindness of the time—a blindness not of the multitude alone, but of the professed expounders of the will of God.

Mr. Garrison left Dr. Beecher with a disappointed and saddened heart, for he had counted with confidence upon his sympathy and support. He had sat under his preaching with profit and delight, and he longed to hear his eloquent voice pleading the cause of the imbruted slave. Disappointed in this, to whom should he next turn? He resolved to visit other clergymen of the city and vicinity and seek their co-operation. But, with hardly an exception, he found them unsympathetic. Dr. Beecher, in speaking for himself, had unconsciously spoken for the rest. Truth had indeed fallen in the street, and Equity could not enter. He resolved to go and see Jeremiah Evarts, Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, who had been writing eloquently in behalf of the Indians. Surely, he said to himself, I shall find a helper in him. But no; Mr. Evarts, with all his sympathy for the outraged Indians, would not speak or write a word in behalf of the slave, or countenance any effort for his emancipation; and Mr. Garrison learned, to his unspeakable disgust, that not a few of the Cherokees and Choctaws, for whom Mr. Evarts was pleading so eloquently, were themselves the owners of negro slaves!

It was in the midst of such darkness, discouragement and doubt that "The Liberator" was born—born to fight slavery to the death, and to record its final extinction. Started without so much as a single dollar of capital, or even one subscriber, it was sustained for thirty-five years by such pluck and endurance, and such faith in God as have been but rarely witnessed in the history of mankind. In the character of its editor it had a moral capital that no fire of persecution could destroy or impair, and no flood of calumny overwhelm. It fought for what is most of all fundamental in the religion of Christ, for that without which it were indeed a mockery and a sham. God and Christ were in the movement, and the gates of hell, though fortified and barricaded by traitor hands, could not prevail against it. The hour had struck, and the man whom God had commissioned to preach deliverance to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that were bound had come. It was in vain now that men cried peace when there was no peace. The pulpit might prostitute itself to the defence of slavery; statesmen might plead in its behalf the sacredness of the Constitutional compacts and compromises; the press might denounce as fanatical the plea for emancipation, and mobs might howl upon the track of the Abolitionists. All in vain! for it was determined in the Divine counsel that American slavery should be overthrown—peaceably, if the nation were so minded, but otherwise in blood! This was the dread alternative presented to the American people. It was Mr. Garrison's hope that the power of Christianity in the land was mighty enough to accomplish the great work. The delusions of the hour, he thought, would pass away, the pulpit would awake to its duty, the churches—a mighty and invincible host—would come up to the help of the Lord against the great iniquity, and the statesmen of the land would show themselves men worthy of such a crisis. The slaveholders themselves, their first madness over, would listen to the voice of reason, and come speedily to see that their own safety and prosperity required that they should undo the heavy burdens and let the oppressed go free. With what earnestness of conviction and what eloquence of speech did he plead the promises of God to a nation that should put away its sin! "Loose the bands of wickedness, undo the heavy burdens, let the oppressed go free, break every yoke, hide not thyself from thine own flesh. Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily; thy righteousness shall go before thee, the glory of the Lord shall be thy rereward, and thy darkness be as the noonday. And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones. Thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not. They that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places. Thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called the repairer of the breach, the restorer of paths to dwell in. Thou shalt delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Equally earnest and equally eloquent was he in depicting the calamities which, in the order of Divine Providence, would come upon the nation if it should persist in its sin: "Therefore, thus saith the Lord: Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty, every one to his brother and every one to his neighbor; behold, I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the Lord, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine."

That a nation, the great body of whose people believed in the plenary inspiration of the Bible, and that its contents were designed for instruction in righteousness as well as for admonition and warning to the whole human race till time should be no more, could listen unmoved to passages like these from the Hebrew prophets, so exactly descriptive of its condition and its perils, would seem incredible if we did not remember that the official and trusted expositors of the time taught it to set them at naught, and filled its ears with apologies for slavery woven of texts from the same Book — as Whittier says :

“Torturing the pages of the hallowed Bible
To sanction robbery, and crime and blood.”

Stuart at Andover, Alexander at Princeton, Fisk at Wilbraham, and others who in high places were training a new generation of ministers, were found, not long afterwards, weaving ingenious arguments from the Scriptures to prove that slaveholding was compatible with the Golden Rule, and that the plea for immediate emancipation was the wildest fanaticism. The ready plea of the apologist for slavery was, that excitement upon the subject would inevitably quench the influences of the Divine Spirit and put an end to the revivals of religion, which were declared to be the great instrumentality for the conversion of the world. The voices of thousands who might otherwise have borne a testimony against slavery were hushed to silence by this specious plea. A small remnant was indeed “faithful among the faithless found,” but they fell under popular reproach, and in some instances were subject to persecution among false brethren.

If we may accept for truth the declaration of the Rev. Albert Barnes, “that there was no power out of the church that would sustain slavery an hour if it were not sustained in it,” then it must be admitted that the church was responsible for the failure to abolish the system by moral power, and for all the blood spilled and treasure lost in the war of the Rebellion! There was no pretence then that Mr. Garrison was an infidel. That plea was invented years afterward, when the churches found it necessary to offer some plausible excuse for their delinquency; and it was no truer then than it would have been if offered at first. It was in the power of the churches, if they had had any heart for the work, to make the movement their own, to lead and guide it from its beginning to its consummation. This, indeed, was what Mr. Garrison desired and expected. He coveted not for himself the honors of leadership, but would have been content to serve the cause inconspicuously, if the men in power and influence had been persuaded to take it up. He was forced to the front when he would gladly have taken his place in the ranks.

iii.

'The First Volume of "The Liberator;" Its Size and Appearance — Scenes in the Office — Distinguished Visitors — Mr. Garrison's Alleged "Bitterness" — Alarm of the Slaveholders — Incitements to Kidnappers — Indifference at the North — The Nat Turner Insurrection — Appeal of "The National Intelligencer" to the North — Mr. Garrison's Defence.

LYING open before me as I write is the first volume of "The Liberator," beginning and ending with the year 1831. It was small for that day, but how much more diminutive it looks in comparison with the weekly journals of the present time! It is a folio of four pages. The page is fourteen inches in length by nine and three-tenths in width. The title at first was in bold-face black-letter, which gave place, at the end of four months, to an engraved head, with a "pictorial representation" of an auction, at which "slaves, horses and other cattle" are seen offered for sale, and of a whipping-post, at which a slave is receiving punishment. In the background is seen the Capitol of Virginia, with a flag, inscribed with the word "Liberty," floating over the dome. This picture of a scene familiar to every Southern eye was regarded as even worse than Mr. Garrison's "harsh language." At the South it was denounced as incendiary, while influential journals at the North declared that it was abominable thus to outrage the feelings of "our Southern brethren" and incite the slaves to insurrection! Then, as now, the champions of "conciliation" thought it unpatriotic to drag into light the cruelties practised upon the negroes. For the sake of harmony, and to avert a dissolution of the Union, the disagreeable facts of slavery ought to be concealed. The Abolitionists were madmen and fools, and utterly devoid of "fraternal feeling" in making such a fuss about the Southern negroes, who were the most contented body of laborers in the world, and flogged only as they deserved to be for their innate laziness and insolence. But Mr. Garrison took little heed of these objurgations. The spirit of his chosen motto, "Our Country is the World, our Countrymen are all Mankind," pervaded and filled his heart, lifting him above the blind and selfish expediency of the time.

As I turn over the pages of this volume, what a flood of memories of that early day stirs my heart! It was indeed, as Lowell describes it, "the day of small things," when "one straightforward conscience" was "put in pawn to win a world." How vividly do I remember "that small chamber, dark, unfurnished and mean," which after the first three weeks became the office of "The Liberator," and the only domicile of its brave editor and his associate. They had announced their determination to publish their paper as long as they could do so by living on bread and water; and so they made their bed on the office floor, and lived for a year or more on such food as they were able to procure at a neighboring bakery. More than once did I partake with them of their humble fare, Mr. Garrison doing the honors of the table with a grace worthy of a richer feast, and a cheerfulness that nothing could disturb. The office was in the third story of the building then known as Merchants' Hall. Everything about it had an aspect of slovenly decay, and Harrison Gray Otis well characterized it as "an obscure hole."

"Yet there the freedom of a race began."

The dingy walls; the small windows, bespattered with printer's ink; the press standing in one corner; the composing stands opposite; the long editorial and mailing table, covered with newspapers; the bed of the editor and publisher on the floor; all these make a picture never to be forgotten. I was a frequent visitor from the first, but in the autumn I removed the office of my own paper, "The Christian Soldier," into an adjoining room, and for a year and a half thereafter printed it on "The Liberator" press. This brought me into still closer relations with Mr. Garrison, making me familiar with the daily current of his life, and fixing and deepening my interest in the anti-slavery movement. His courage, enthusiasm and devotion, so unlike anything I had ever witnessed before, awakened my admiration, and gave me a new conception of the majesty and power of a single human life. I do not lightly estimate the value of what the world calls an education, but I think Mr. Garrison did more and better for me than any college or theological seminary could have done. The quickening, inspiring power of his conversation exceeded that of any other man I have ever known. His heart was all aflame with enthusiasm for his cause, but never for a moment was his calm judgment overcome by heat. A faith so absolute in the sacredness and power of moral principles, a trust in God so firm and immovable as his, I have never seen exhibited by any other man. Never for an instant did he doubt the success of the movement to which, upon his knees, with his Bible open before him, he had consecrated his life. Whoever else might yield to discouragement, he never. Though the Southern press denounced him as a murderer and a cut-throat, and every mail from that quarter brought him threats of assassination if he did not desist from his work, he never for one moment wavered in his purpose or indicated the slightest personal fear. How often did I hear him speak in tenderest pity of the deluded men who stood ready to take his life at the first opportunity. Not a word of vindictiveness or even of bitterness ever escaped his lips, and he would far sooner have laid down his own life than taken that of an enemy.

That "obscure hole" was the scene of many a memorable talk. Among those who came to confer with the editor I remember Samuel J. May, who combined the courage of Paul with the lovingness of John, and who was ever afterward a conspicuous figure in the anti-slavery host; Ellis Gray Loring, then a rising young lawyer, with a clear head and a sound conscience, whose death in the prime of his powers left a vacancy that could not be filled; Samuel E. Sewall, of an honored Massachusetts family, a man fitted by his legal attainments and his judicial spirit for a high place on the bench, and who yet lives in a green old age to mourn the loss of the founder of "The Liberator"; David Lee Child, the bold editor and the faithful champion of the oppressed of every nation and clime; John G. Whittier, then almost unknown to fame, but whose flashing eye and intrepid mien foretold the songs of freedom with which he afterward thrilled and stirred the hearts of his countrymen; Joshua Coffin, the antiquarian, Whittier's old schoolmaster, and the subject of one of his characteristic lays; Arnold Buffum, the Quaker hatter, lately returned from England, where he had caught the spirit of Clarkson, Wilberforce, O'Connell and Buxton, and thus prepared himself to greet the rising Liberator of America; Moses Thatcher, an Orthodox clergyman, one of the first of the profession to welcome the call for immediate emancipation; and Amos A. Phelps, then pastor of the Congregational church in Pine Street, whose labors in the cause as speaker and writer were for several years invaluable. Mr. Garrison was never too busy with his pen or his composing-stick to talk with those who cared enough for the cause to seek his presence. He was ever ready to answer inquiries for information, or to explain his principles, purposes and plans, and it was seldom that any one who conversed with him for ten minutes failed to be deeply and favorably impressed. At this time he would have thought it impossible to address an audience for the space of one minute without first committing his remarks to writing; but as a talker he was fluent, copious and strong, never hesitating for a word, or failing to hit the nail squarely upon the head. It was impossible to hear him and not be moved. Many an opponent who thought to overcome him in argument found himself, after a brief encounter, hors de combat, and was obliged to retire with a broken lance. If an antagonist had a conscience, Garrison was sure to enlist it on his side. In a few simple, well-chosen words he cut his way through every web of sophistry, however cunningly woven, making slavery look the hideous thing that it is, and maintaining the humanity of the negro with a cogency of reasoning that nothing could resist.

The language of Mr. Garrison has been called bitter by those whose sympathies for the slaveholders and their apologists were superior to their sense of the sin of slavery and their regard for the equal rights of the negro. His bitterness, however, was only the inevitable bitterness of truth to men whose lives are stained by flagrant sin. His descriptions of slavery and of the sin of slaveholding were simply and scientifically accurate, as if he had said a spade is a spade, a brick is a brick, a lie is a lie. Not a word was added from malice or the love of severity, or with the purpose of making men angry. He wounded only to heal. He knew that the people of the United States could not be roused to the work of abolishing slavery by smooth phrases, in which the truth was rather concealed than expressed. He knew that the consciences of slaveholders could be reached by no half-truths, and that the torpid conscience of the North demanded not sedatives but a probe. In all this his judgment was as cool and accurate as that of a mathematician in calculating the contents of the cube or the square. Some of his timid friends thought the name of "The Liberator" sounded harsh and would inevitably create a prejudice against the movement. One of these suggested that "The Safety-Lamp" would be a better name, it sounded so gentle! But if he had been capable of taking this advice he would have been wholly unfitted for his work. "I will be," he said, "as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice. . . . I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch; and I WILL BE HEARD." . . . "In attacking the system of slavery, I clearly foresaw all that has happened to me. I knew, at the commencement, that my motives would be impeached, my warnings ridiculed, my person persecuted, my sanity doubted, my life jeopardized; but the clank of the prisoner's chains broke upon my ear—it entered deeply into my soul—I looked up to Heaven for strength to sustain me in the perilous work of emancipation, and my resolution was taken." The Hebrew prophets and Jesus and his apostles were his models; he would be like them even if he shared their fate. Those who imagine that he used language loosely, carelessly, recklessly, wholly mistake his character. He weighed his words as exactly and scrupulously as the pharmacist weighs the constituents of the physician's prescription, and those who read them now that slavery is dead will find in them no other bitterness than that which was necessarily involved in their truth and justice. The spirit that dictated them was kindred to that of Him who, while fearlessly denouncing the leaders of the Jewish people for their crimes, could yet exclaim: "O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem! thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee! How oft would I have gathered you as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but ye would not." The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, in his sermon on the death of Mr. Garrison, repeats this charge of bitterness, but without citing a word of proof. He insists that, unlike Jesus and the prophets, he was destitute of the spirit of love for those whom he denounced. It is very easy, at this distance from the times in which the prophets and Jesus respectively lived, to talk of their loving spirit as qualifying their denunciations; but if Mr. Beecher had been the son of one of that band of Pharisees whom Jesus indiscriminately denounced as a "generation of vipers" and "hypocrites," who "devoured widows' houses, and for a pretence made long prayers," and been called upon after the crucifixion to deliver a discourse upon his life and character, would he have been able to find the soul of love in those denunciations? I doubt it; and yet it is there, as it is also in the epithets which Garrison applied to slavery and to slaveholders. Can it for a moment be imagined that there was anything in the character or conduct of the Scribes and Pharisees more fitted to excite the indignation of a noble mind, and to call for and justify the use of strong epithets, than was seen in the example of the men who, with the Declaration of Independence in one hand and the Bible in the other, and the name of the blessed Christ on their lips, held their fellow-beings in a state of slavery which John Wesley, pronounced "the vilest that ever saw the sun"? Why, then, should men who are able to find the fruits of love in the terrible denunciations that fell from the lips of Jesus, be so ready to charge Mr. Garrison with bitterness? Time has vindicated the Master, and it will yet vindicate His faithful disciple.

The men who are most prone to condemn as bitter those who in this age of the world are called to wage earnest war against iniquity in high places, are not so blind as to the reasonableness of severe denunciations, nor so unwilling to apologize for them, as is often supposed. I was forcibly struck, a short time since, with a passage which I found in the Rev. Dr. W. T. G. Shedd's address at the opening of the term in the Union Theological Seminary. Dr. Shedd is a conservative of the conservatives, who stood carefully aloof from Abolitionism, and it is worth while to note the philosophical ground upon which such a man apologizes for the use of "hard language." "The inflexible earnestness of the lover of truth," says the learned Professor, "explains that phraseology, more common in the century of the Reformation than now, which is often cited in proof of the bitterness and malignity of the theologian. Luther, and even the mild Melancthon, use words that are like drawn swords, when speaking of the teachers of certain tenets. Milton describes Salmasius in phraseology still more vehement than that of the theologian. It is an error to assume that in these instances, the energy of the epithets is aimed at the persons. It is aimed at their opinions. It is like the damnatory clause in the Athanasian Creed; the real meaning of which is that the denial of the deity of Jesus Christ, and of the trinity of the Divine Being, is what an inspired apostle denominates a 'damnable heresy,' a fatal error. That creed, in its damnatory clause, does not undertake to decide the state of the heart, and actually pronounce, in anticipation, the final judgment of God respecting a particular individual; because the latitudinarian person may be better than his creed, and the orthodox person may be worse than his. But leaving the person and the state of the heart to the judgment of God, and having reference only to a tenet or a doctrine, both the creed and the theologian are authorized to say that if the dogma of the deity of Christ is a saving truth, then the dogma that He is only a creature is a fatal error. For this is only to say that if the sum of two numbers is four, it cannot be six. Respecting the unyielding earnestness of orthodoxy, and the plain utterance which it sometimes necessitates, the words of Lord Bacon are in point: 'Bitter and earnest writing must not hastily be condemned; for men cannot contend coldly and without affection about things which they hold dear and precious. A politic man may write from his brain, without touch and sense of his heart, as in a speculation that appertaineth not unto him; but a feeling Christian will express in his words a character of zeal, and of love.'

It seems to come to this: that an Orthodox theologian, "when speaking of the teachers of certain tenets," will be authorized, by his "inflexible earnestness" as "a lover of truth," to "use words that are drawn swords"; while the men who are called of God to fight such a system of wickedness as American slavery was, and whose souls are on fire with love of freedom, and with sympathy for the oppressed and wronged, must confine themselves to the use of soft phrases, on pain of being denounced from Christian pulpits as bitter. A mistaken theory as to the nature and offices of Christ is worse than to sell him at auction in the persons of those whom he calls his brethren. "Damnatory clauses" and "words that are like drawn swords" are wholesome for men who have a twist in their theology, but wholly inappropriate to the perpetrators of great crimes and their defenders and apologists!

The simple truth is, that this charge of bitterness has been brought against every reformer who ever did anything effectually for the redemption of the world from any system of iniquity, and it never had less foundation in truth than in the case of Mr. Garrison. Dr. Channing has been accounted a mild man, but he found justification for the "harsh language" of Milton in the character of the times in which he wrote, and in the nature of the evils with which he was forced to contend; and in vindicating the great champion of English liberty he has made an unanswerable defence of the great advocate of negro emancipation:—

“Great evils were struggling for perpetuity, and could only be broken down by great power. Milton felt that interests of great moment were at stake; and who will blame him for binding himself to them with the whole energy of his great mind, and for defending them with fervor and vehemence? We must not mistake Christian benevolence, as if it had but one voice—that of soft entreaty. It can speak in awful and piercing tones. There is constantly going on in our world a conflict between good and evil. . . . Men gifted with great power of thought and loftiness of sentiment are especially summoned to the conflict. . . . They must speak with an indignant energy, and they ought not to be measured by the standard of ordinary minds in ordinary times. Men of natural softness and timidity, of a sincere but effeminate virtue, will be apt to look on these bolder, hardier spirits as violent, perturbed and uncharitable; and the charge will not be wholly groundless. But that deep feeling of evils which is necessary to effectual conflict with them, and which marks God’s most powerful messengers to mankind, cannot breathe itself in soft and tender accents. The deeply moved soul will speak strongly, and ought to speak so as to move and shake nations.”

Some of the modern talkers about reforming the world by love — by which they mean the reduction to moral flabbiness of every testimony against great systems of iniquity — would do well to study the life of John Milton.

That the slaveholders were seriously alarmed by the appearance of “The Liberator” was manifest by the efforts they made to prevent its circulation and frighten its intrepid editor from the field. The Vigilance Association of Columbia, S. C., composed, according to “The Charleston Mercury,” of “gentlemen of the first respectability,” on the 4th of October, 1831, “offered a reward of $1,500 for the apprehension and prosecution to conviction of any white person who might be detected in distributing or circulating 'The Liberator,' or any other publications of a seditious tendency." The authorities of Georgetown, D. C., enacted a law making it penal for any free person of color to take from the post-office "the paper published in Boston, called 'The Liberator.'" In Raleigh, N. C., a grand jury found a true bill against the editor and the publisher, evidently in the hope of finding a way to bring them to that State for trial. A writer in that grave and dignified old paper, "The National Intelligencer," published in Washington, proposed that Mr. Garrison should be indicted and tried in Virginia, and that, after conviction, a demand for his surrender should be made upon the Governor of Massachusetts. Mr. Hayne of South Carolina, the champion of nullification, having received by mail a copy of "The Liberator," wrote to the Hon. Harrison Gray Otis, Mayor of Boston, asking to be informed who sent it; and Mr. Otis, desiring to oblige his distinguished friend, sent a deputy to Mr. Garrison, hoping to extract from him a confession that he was the guilty man! Mr. Garrison, with the true Yankee instinct, answered the interrogatory of Mr. Otis's agent by propounding another, viz.: "By what authority does the Hon. Robert Y. Hayne ask me such question?" Thus were the great South Carolinian and his Northern tool foiled in their attempt to make the anti-slavery editor criminate himself and lay the foundation for a requisition for his person upon the Governor of the old Commonwealth. But it was left to the State of Georgia to cap the climax of malignant folly in the passage of a law offering $5,000 "to be paid by the Governor to any person or persons arresting and bringing to trial, under the laws of the State, and prosecuting to conviction, the editor or publisher of 'The Liberator,' or any other person who shall utter, publish or circulate said paper in Georgia." This was nothing less than a bribe to any ruffian who might choose on any dark night to go to the office of Mr. Garrison and seize and convey him to a Southern vessel lying at the wharf not far distant. In response to this threat, Mr. Garrison said: "Know this, ye patrons of kidnappers, that we despise your threats as much as we deplore your infatuation; nay, more — know that a hundred men stand ready to fill our place as soon as it is made vacant by violence. 'The Liberator' shall yet live — live to warn you of your danger and guilt — live to plead for the perishing slaves — live to hail the day of universal emancipation. For every hair of our head which you touch, there shall spring up an asserter of the rights of your bondsmen, and an upbraider of your crimes."

And how were these menaces and threats received at the North? Not by any means with the indignation they were fitted to excite in the breasts of freemen jealous for the liberty of the press; but generally with cool indifference, if not with positive sympathy. The Northern press made constant obeisance to "King Cotton," and dared do no more than to suggest, with whispered humbleness, that perhaps it might be carrying things a little too far to kidnap the miserable fanatic who was disturbing the peace of the South! The newspapers that dared to speak in terms of honest indignation of these attempts to destroy the freedom of the press were those of smallest circulation, and might be counted on one's fingers. The moral stupor that rested upon the press and the people of the North at that time seems utterly incredible now.

The Southampton (Va.) insurrection of slaves, led by Nat Turner, occurred in the summer of 1831, when "The Liberator" was only a few months old. Turner was himself a slave, and he persuaded his deluded followers that he was a prophet sent by God to lead them out of the house of bondage. There was never the slightest reason to suppose that he had ever seen so much as a single copy of "The Liberator," and if he had he would have found in it nothing to encourage his murderous project, but, on the contrary, much to dissuade him therefrom. For Mr. Garrison from the very start avowed his opposition to war and violence under all circumstances. In the very first number of his paper he apostrophized the slaves in these memorable words:—

"Not by the sword shall your deliverance be;
 Not by the shedding of your masters' blood;
 Not by rebellion, or foul treachery,
 Upspringing suddenly, like swelling flood:
 Revenge and rapine ne'er did bring forth good.
 God's time is best! nor will it long delay:
 E'en now your barren cause begins to bud,
 And glorious shall the fruit be! Watch and pray,
 For, lo! the kindling dawn, that ushers in the day!"

But, in spite of all such protestations, and notwithstanding the notorious fact that Mr. Garrison was a non-resistant, the press at the North, as well as at the South, insisted that he was responsible for the Nat Turner insurrection, with all its cruelties and horrors. Governor Floyd, in his message to the Virginia Legislature, said there was too much cause to suspect that the plans of the insurrection had been "designed and matured by unrestrained fanatics in some of the neighboring States." That this was an allusion to Mr. Garrison and his associates was universally understood at the time. Northern newspapers found it hard to believe that a body of "contented laborers" like the Virginia slaves could revolt against the authority of their kind masters unless they were invited to do so by mischievous fanatics; and who but Garrison could be the guilty cause of such madness? There were moments when it seemed as if the misguided public opinion of the hour would demand the suppression of "The Liberator," and it is not easy now to see what it was, except the restraining interposition of Providence, that prevented the people in their madness from doing all that the slaveholders desired. Few newspapers of that day exerted an influence so powerful as that of "The National Intelligencer," in which the respectability, learning, statesmanship and conservatism of the time were incarnated. To the people of New England this paper dared to appeal in these terms:—

“No one knows better than we do the sincerity with which the intelligent population of New England abhor and reprobate the incendiary publications which are intended by their authors to lead to precisely such results (as concerns the whites) as the Southampton tragedy. But we appeal to the people of New England, if not in behalf of the innocent women and children of the whites, then in behalf of the blacks, whose utter extermination will be the result of any general commotion, whether they will continue to permit their humanity to be under the reproach of approving or even tolerating the atrocities among them which have already caused the plains of the South to be manured with human flesh and blood. To be more specific in our object, we now appeal to the worthy Mayor of the City of Boston, whether no law can be found to prevent the publication, in the city over which he presides, of such diabolical papers [copies of 'The Liberator'] as we have seen a sample of here in the hands of slaves, and of which there are many in circulation to the south of us. We have no doubt whatever of the feelings of Mr. Otis on this subject, or those of his respectable constituents. We know they would prompt him and them to arrest the instigator of human butchery in his mad career. We know the difficulty which surrounds the subject, because the nuisance is not a nuisance, technically speaking, within the limits of Massachusetts. But, surely, if the courts of law have no power, public opinion has, to interfere, until the intelligent Legislature of Massachusetts can provide a durable remedy for this most appalling grievance. The crime is as great as that of poisoning a well. . . . We know nothing of the man [Garrison]; we desire not to have him unlawfully dealt with; we can even conceive of his motive being good in his own opinion; but it is the motive of the man who cuts the throats of your wife and children."

Having thus deliberately accused Mr. Garrison of the most atrocious crimes, and sought to crush him by an inflamed public opinion under the forms of law, "The National Intelligencer" was true to itself and to the cause it served in refusing to publish his triumphant defence. It thus illustrated the spirit of American slavery, which could not endure the light of a free press, but was instinctively impelled to hide itself in perpetual darkness. In his reply, Mr Garrison said:

"I appeal to God, whom I fear and serve, and to its patrons, in proof that the real and only purpose of 'The Liberator' is to prevent rebellion, by the application of those preservative principles which breathe peace on earth, goodwill to men. I advance nothing more. I stand on no other foundation than this: 'Whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.' I urge the immediate abolition of slavery, not only because the slaves possess an inalienable right to liberty, but because the system, to borrow the words of Mr. Randolph, is 'a volcano in full operation'; and by its continuance we must expect a National explosion. . . . The present generation cannot appreciate the purity of my motives or the value of my exertions. I look to posterity for a good reputation. The unborn offspring of those who are now living will reverse the condemnatory decision of my contemporaries. Without presuming to rank myself among them, I do not forget that those reformers who were formerly treated as the 'offscouring of the earth' are now lauded beyond measure; I do not forget that Christ and His apostles — harmless, undefiled and prudent as they were — were buffeted, calumniated and crucified; and therefore my soul is steady to its pursuit as the needle to the pole. If we would not see our land deluged in blood, we must instantly burst asunder the shackles of the slaves — treat them as rational and injured beings — give them lands to cultivate and the means of employment, and multiply schools for themselves and their children. We shall then have little to fear. The wildest beasts may be subdued and rendered gentle by kind treatment. Make the slaves free, and every inducement to revolt is taken away. . . . I see the design of the clamor raised against 'The Liberator.' It is to prevent public indignation from resting upon the system of slavery, and to concentrate it upon my own head. That system contains the materials of self-destruction."

"The National Intelligencer" spoke for the statesmanship of that time; but how wild, incoherent, unjust and illogical were its utterances! Mr. Garrison was deemed a fanatic; but mark the wisdom and truth of his words, the reasonableness of his appeals, the justice of his denunciations and the calmness of his reliance upon the judgment of posterity! The extracts I have given above are of the body and spirit of the times. They reveal, as nothing else would, the delusion that rested upon the people at that day, and show those of this generation what courage, what faith in God, what love for humanity, and what a spirit of self-sacrifice it required to begin the fight with American slavery. If Garrison had faltered and retreated, what calamities might not have befallen the Nation! The fate of the Republic, according to our limited vision, depended upon the fidelity of a single man; for, if the Nation had gone on sinning against light for another generation, where would have been the hope of its rescue from the ruthless clutch of the Slave Power? Already it had sunk into a stupor from which the most powerful and startling blasts of truth were barely sufficient to rouse it to life and some degree of moral sensibility. A little more drugging of conscience, and perchance the call for reform would have been too late, and the Republic founded by Washington, Adams and Jefferson might have perished in the foul embrace of slavery!

Is there not in this a lesson for the present hour? On every side we hear the voices of men claiming to be statesmen, who brand as enmity to the South every earnest plea for the equal rights of the negro ; who ask us to stop our ears to the cry of men driven from the ballot-box and defrauded of their wages by violence, and to close our eyes to the frauds by which the South has been made "solid" in order to gain by political power the substance of what she failed to achieve by the sword. We are told on the one hand that it is perfectly patriotic and reasonable for the semi-civilized South to be a unit in her opposition to the vast majority of the intelligent people of the North ; and on the other that it is unpatriotic, unreasonable and cruel, a revival of all the worst passions and enmities of the war, for the latter to resist the efforts of the former to rule the Nation by an alliance with the men of the Northern slums ! The sirens who are filling our ears with this song, disguised under smooth and seductive phrases, are the natural descendants of the men of a previous generation who were forever seeking to lull the North into indifference to the negro's wrongs, and always ready with some new compromise in the interest of the slaveholding class. If the enfranchised men of the South were white, the North would be all on fire with indignation over their wrongs, and ready to exert the last iota of constitutional power for their protection. Above all would they take care that the oppressors should not, by any political combination whatever, gain an ascendancy over the Republic. Let us have the principle and the courage to do for the negro what we should not hesitate to do for the white man. The voice of Garrison cries to us out of his freshly-made grave, bidding us not to waste the heritage won for us by his indomitable courage, and by the blood and bravery of our soldiers.

IV.

Mr. Garrison's Early Orthodoxy — No Odor of Heresy about him until long after the Churches and the Clergy had Rejected his Message — A Christian at the Last no less than at the First — Reluctance of Ministers to Pray in Anti-Slavery Meetings — Rev. Amos A. Phelps and his Book — The A. B. C. F. M. — The Methodist Church — Dr. Whedon's Denial — Testimony of Judge Jay — The Freewill Baptists.

So persistent have been the efforts made in certain quarters to excuse the hostility of the ministers and churches to the anti-slavery movement on the ground of Mr. Garrison's alleged infidelity, that it becomes important to set forth the truth on this subject with great clearness. In turning over the leaves of the first volume of "The Liberator," we find the evidences of Mr. Garrison's thorough-going Orthodoxy in great abundance. There was not about him the least odor of heresy of any kind, save in his belief in the perfect humanity of the negro, and in his denunciations of slavery as a sin. We find him pleading for the universal diffusion of the Bible as the chief instrumentality for promoting the cause. "Take away the Bible," he exclaims, "and our warfare with oppression, and infidelity, and intemperance, and impurity, and crime is at an end; our weapons are wrested away, our foundation is removed; we have no authority to speak, and no courage to act." That in later years he held the views of the Bible common among Quakers and Unitarians is not denied; but this was long after the American clergy and churches had repudiated the anti-slavery movement. Indeed, it was this repudiation on their part that led him to the investigations which resulted in the modification of his inherited views on this and some other points. But to the very last the Bible was to him "the Book of books," and he found in its pages the truths on which his soul was fed, and which were his chief reliance in the great struggle with slavery. His writings and speeches from first to last throb with quotations of the most striking appositeness and power from that book. Above any minister of the Gospel whom I have ever known, he was indeed "mighty in the Scriptures," and thousands have confessed that before hearing him they were not half aware of the quickening and inspiring power of the volume around which so many of the most sacred associations of the Christian world are clustered.

He was also the friend and champion of the revivals of religion for which that period was distinguished; looking to them with hope as likely to hasten the day of emancipation. "Emancipation," he said, "must be the work of Christianity and of the churches. They must achieve the elevation of the blacks, and place them on the equality of the Gospel. If the present revivals be (as we trust they are) the fruit of the Holy Spirit, we pray that they may embrace the nation, nor cease till the bodies and souls of its population be 'redeemed, regenerated and disenthralled,' and every man shall sit under his own vine and fig-tree, there being none to molest or make him afraid. Take courage, ye mourning slaves, for your redemption is at hand." If, not long afterward, he found many of the leaders in the revival movement closing churches and pulpits against the advocates of emancipation, and warning converts that if they would guard the flame of their piety from extinction they must not allow themselves to become involved in the anti-slavery excitement, need we wonder that his faith in revivals, as thus conducted, was somewhat shaken? And when, not much later, the venerable Professor of Theology at Andover was accustomed to say to his senior class,

"Young gentlemen, if you hope to be settled over intelligent, cultivated and prosperous parishes, you must be careful to keep aloof from the exciting questions of the day," is it any wonder that the champion of emancipation began to suspect there might be an important distinction between the Christianity of Christ and that of the American churches? Who was responsible for suggesting this thought to many earnest Christian minds is plain enough.

Another illustration of Mr. Garrison's evangelical Orthodoxy is found in his advice to the colored people of the country to set apart a day for fasting, humiliation and prayer on account of the wickedness of slavery, and the oppressions arising therefrom. "Who," he asked, "may estimate the importance of such a measure? We say to our dear colored brethren, 'Let us pray more, and fast more, and the Lord will do great and signal things for us.'" This is the sort of infidelity against which the American churches braced themselves when they turned their backs upon the anti-slavery movement.

Again, Mr. Garrison held and inculcated in "The Liberator" at first the most Orthodox views of the Sabbath. He would no sooner have gone to the post-office on that day to mail or receive a letter than he would have stolen the contents of a contribution-box. In "The Liberator" of April 16th, 1831, appeared from his pen the following sonnet:—

THE SABBATH DAY.

Faint prototype of Heaven, blest Sabbath day!
 Emblem of an eternal rest to come;
 Emancipator from vile Mammon's sway,
 At whose approach a noisy world is dumb;
 Unerring regulator, sacred pledge;
 Best friend and soother of the poor and weak;
 A resting-place in our drear pilgrimage,
 Where soul and body may refreshment seek;
 If thou wert blotted out, our moral sun,
 The huge eclipse would dress the world in gloom;

Confusion dire would seize on every one,
And peace, love, order find a hasty tomb;
Then would oppression reign, then lust rebel,
Then violence abound, and earth resemble hell!

If this sonnet does not rank among the best of Mr. Garrison's productions in verse, it is yet good enough to show the hollowness of the pretence that the American clergy and churches rejected the anti-slavery movement because they were unwilling to follow the lead of an infidel. Is it not time that men who would be accounted honorable ceased to utter a calumny so easily refuted?

It is certainly vain to attempt to blot from the page of history the sad and disgraceful truth that the representatives of the popular Christianity of that day were deaf to the groans and agonies of the slaves, insensible of the humanity of the negro, indifferent to the sin and shame of slavery, and disposed to take the slaveholder's part against every earnest effort for abolition. True, there was "a glorious remnant," "faithful among the faithless found," who espoused the cause with ingenuous promptness, and did what they could to rally the ministers and churches to their duty; but they made themselves odious in the sects to which they respectively belonged, so strong and overwhelming was the tide of pro-slavery opinion and sympathy at that day. There has been an attempt of late years to make the fidelity of these exceptional men a shield and covert for the churches that persecuted them; but the justice of God will never permit such a travesty of the truth of history. An attempt to show that the Jewish nation did not reject and crucify Christ, because all his disciples were Jews, and "the common people heard him gladly," would not be a whit more preposterous. As well deny that the United States was a slaveholding nation because thousands of its citizens were Abolitionists, as deny that the American churches were

"the bulwarks of American slavery" because a small remnant among them were found faithful. No clergyman of that day, however eminent, could have espoused the cause without risking the loss of his parish and his reputation at the same time. The swelling tide of ecclesiasticism had a power as irresistible as that of Niagara, and was sure to overwhelm and swallow up any clergyman who dared to resist it. I remember that the popular pastor of a Congregational church near Boston, a man who afterward achieved eminence as a writer as well as preacher, lost his pulpit because he delivered a lyceum lecture to the colored people of Boston, and because, in the face of many private remonstrances, he persisted in remembering the slaves in his public prayers. The leading members of the church were Boston merchants, and they informed the pastor that his leanings toward the anti-slavery cause were destroying his usefulness. He was constrained to avoid an open quarrel by resigning.

It was thus that the great body of the clergy were held captive in the interest of the Slave Power, many of them no doubt unwillingly and greatly to their own secret disgust. It was almost impossible sometimes to find in Boston a clergyman of any standing who would so much as consent to open an anti-slavery meeting with prayer. I remember that on more than one occasion I spent a whole day in a vain effort to persuade some one among a dozen white clergymen to perform this office, and had at last to accept the services of a "nigger" preacher from "nigger" hill! That preacher was dear old Father Samuel Snowdon, one of the brightest, wittiest and best men, black as he was, that ever entered a pulpit. His genius was not below that of Father Taylor, who was also a preacher to seamen, and a Methodist; but of course "nigger" sailors could not worship with white ones on terms of equality in Boston, and so Father Snowdon found his sphere. His prayers were as full of salt and as nautical in their phraseology as those of his white brother. The Abolitionists were proud of him, and his prayers were as remarkable for their oddity as for their fervor. I remember that on the occasion above referred to he prayed thus: "O Lord, bless the good British ship 'Buzzard,' that rescued a cargo of slaves the other day on the African coast. Give her a fair wind, Lord, and drive her right into port. And, O God! we pray that that seven-headed, ten-horned monster, the Colonization Society, may be smitten through and through with the fiery darts of truth, and tormented as the whale is between the sword-fish and the thresher."

On one occasion, however, in 1833, we were to have a meeting in the Representatives' Hall in the State House. How it happened that we got the use of the hall I am not now sure; but it had been granted to the Colonization Society a short time before, and I believe the simple-minded country members of the Legislature concluded that we ought to have it once, just to make things even. At any rate we were to have it, and it was thought important that some white minister of good standing should serve as chaplain on the occasion. It became my duty to procure such an one if possible. I was then editor of a little paper, "The Christian Soldier," which, being devoted to the resistance of the then rising heresy of Universalism, was in favor among the evangelical clergy of Boston, with many of whom I was personally acquainted. To one after another of these I went with my plea, only to be met with a stern refusal. Not one of them could be persuaded so far to countenance an Abolition meeting as to pray for it. Last of all I went to my dear friend, the Rev. Amos A. Phelps, pastor of the Pine Street Church, who had but just begun his ministry in the city. He had been considering the slavery question, but had not fully made up his mind what he ought to do. I told him of my ill-luck with the older and more conspicuous pastors, and besought him to come to the rescue. He at first declined, telling me he had just come to a struggling church and was afraid its prosperity might be endangered if he should comply with my request. At length, however, seeing how deeply I felt on the subject, he agreed to my proposal with fear and trembling. The censures bestowed upon him by his brethren, for thus giving countenance to the Abolition movement, led him to deeper reflection upon the subject, and he soon afterward took his stand openly as an Abolitionist. His subsequent services in the cause were invaluable. Up to that time the Abolitionists had been somewhat puzzled to find an exact definition of slavery, by which it could, under all circumstances, be distinguished from any any other human relation or institution. Mr. Phelps was distinguished as a logician, and when he entered upon the discussion of the subject he saw the need of a definition so clear as to exclude cavil, and after careful study and reflection he hit upon this: Slavery is the holding of a human being as property. In all subsequent discussions of the subject this definition, which was universally accepted, was of great value. It enabled us to sweep away at once a whole brood of sophistries that had sprung from the confounding of slavery with the relation of parent and child, of master and apprentice, of criminal and magistrate, etc., and to show that the system was in its very nature a sin against God and a crime against man. It was taken up by all the anti-slavery speakers, who found it would stand every test applied to it, and that it greatly simplified the argument against slavery, making it clear to the understanding of common men. Mr. Phelps was wont to say that he owed his conversion to the anti-slavery cause to me. If he was right, then I have not lived in vain nor been wholly useless to the cause in which so much of my life has been spent; for few men were more successful than he in convincing the judgment and swaying the convictions of men. As a lecturer and editor during the period antecedent to the division of 1839, he did the cause noble service. Of his course after that date this is not the place to speak.

The American Board of Foreign Missions was then rising into prominence and power, and drawing to itself the sympathy and almost idolatrous reverence of the churches, especially in New England. It was natural to expect that the men who were contributing of their wealth to redeem the heathen in the farthest ends of the earth from their ignorance and debasement would be among the first to respond to an appeal in behalf of the heathenized and imbruted slaves at home. But all such expectations proved vain. The managers of the Board were deadly hostile to the anti-slavery movement from the start. The piety of Boston was subsidized in the interest of the cotton trade. The champions of the Board appeared to think that if the churches should become enlisted in the anti-slavery cause, they would cease to feel a proper interest in foreign missions. And so, while the churches were constantly reminded of the ignorance and degradation of the heathen abroad, every pains was taken to conceal or excuse the enforced debasement of the heathen at home. It was held to be a primary duty of the American churches to send the Bible and the Gospel of Christ to foreign nations sitting in darkness and the shadow of death; but at the same time it was held to be perfectly compatible with Christianity and the teaching of the Holy Book to prevent men and women born and living in America from learning how to spell the name of God, to compel them to work without wages under the lash, and to sell them on the auction-block and put the proceeds in the Lord's treasury! Oh, what a night of ignorance, delusion and sin was that from which the anti-slavery movement delivered the American people!

While these sketches were passing through the columns of "The New York Tribune," the truthfulness of the statements made in the preceding pages concerning the attitude of the churches from 1830 to the close of 1833 was called in question by the Rev. Dr. Whedon, editor of "The Methodist Quarterly Review." Paying a tribute to my "profound honesty," he nevertheless is bold enough to pronounce my statements, "so far as Methodism is concerned, unhistorical and false." As the reader will observe, I had said nothing specifically of the Methodist church, but only alluded to the churches generally, as unfriendly to the anti-slavery movement. Why, then, this haste to put in a defence of Methodism, as if it had been particularly assailed? Whatever may have been the motive, my "profound honesty" will no doubt be accepted as a guaranty of my gratitude to any one who will detect any essential error in my statements. But, having duly considered Dr. Whedon's attempt to impeach my historical verity, I am constrained to re-affirm the statements of which he complained. It is true, as he says, that "Methodism," or a portion of the Methodist church, "responded early" to the voice of Garrison; but that response was not heard until 1835, as the files of the Methodist paper published in Boston at that period will show; and when it was at length heard, Dr. Whedon did all that he could to smother it, by heaping the grossest abuse upon Mr. Garrison, caricaturing his principles and misrepresenting his designs. The Doctor says, "it is certain that the delegates to our general conference of 1832 from the New England annual conference were, to a man, 'Garrisonian Abolitionists,' indorsing and affiliating with his societies." Now the only society representing Mr. Garrison's views at that period, so far as I can recollect, was the New England Anti-Slavery Society, which was organized in January, 1832, while the General Conference met in May. I have before me now, a list of the delegates to that conference from New England, and among them I do not find one who, at that time, was known to me as a "Garrisonian Abolitionist." I was the secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society, and if these delegates were to a man "affiliated" with it, it seems strange that I should have been ignorant of the fact. The Rev. Dr. Wilbur Fisk was one of the body of delegates who, according to Dr. Whedon, "were to a man affiliated with" Mr. Garrison. If he was an Abolitionist at that period, then it will be safe to reckon John C. Calhoun and George McDuffie in the same category. Other histories besides mine will in that case demand correction at the hands of Dr. Whedon. The simple truth is that the files of the Boston Methodist paper from 1831 to 1834, afford no more evidence of any excitement in the church on the subject of slavery than can be found in any cemetery. The excitement that began in 1835, with the discussion opened in "Zion's Herald" by Orange Scott, grew directly out of Mr. Garrison's movement, after that long period of deadness and silence in the whole Northern church to which I have referred in previous pages.

Dr. Whedon claims to have "coincided," as an anti-slavery man, "with Benjamin Lundy;" but I venture to say, that that sturdy old Quaker could have read what Dr. Whedon wrote on the subject of slavery in 1835 with no other emotions than those of disgust and indignation. The Doctor will find that Benjamin Lundy's Quaker coat and hat will not avail him as a rampart in his warfare against Mr. Garrison. There was no such discrepancy in the views of those two reformers as he seems to suppose.

Again, Dr. Whedon says: "As to the earlier date of my anti-slaveryism, I may say that I voted with the germinal Liberty Party somewhere about 1834, for Governor of Connecticut; with the same party for James G. Birney," etc. According to this he was more concerned for the anti-slavery purity of his political party than for that of his church. He could not vote for a slaveholder or an apologist for slavery at the polls, but he could be a member and a minister of a church, thousands of whose members were permitted to buy and sell slaves as they bought and sold cattle in the market; and he gave his time and strength for years in opposing and hindering those who sought to free the church from this abomination. But I find it difficult to reconcile his claim to have been a voter "with the germinal Liberty Party somewhere about 1834," with the fact that in "Zion's Herald" of March 18, 1835, he endeavored to excite the public indignation against the Abolitionists on the special ground that they intended ultimately to make their movement a "political party agitation," and only "wanted strength" to do so at once. He even fortified himself in his assault by a quotation from Mr. Garrison, from which it would seem that the founder of the anti-slavery movement was himself the originator of the good Doctor's political party, in co-operating with which, even then, five years before its birth, he was finding relief for his intense hostility to slavery. In 1835 he arraigned Mr. Garrison as an unpatriotic and designing man, and held him up to public reprobation, for saying, "that the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the District of Columbia and the Territories is to be made a test at the polls;" and yet, "somewhere about 1834," he was himself slyly voting with "the germinal Liberty Party" for the same purpose!

The good Doctor having thus condescended to correct my "unhistorical and false" statements concerning Methodism, ventures to make, on his own account, this contribution to the history of the anti-slavery cause: "Every step he [Garrison] took and word he uttered maddened the slaveholders and solidified them into hostile adamant." Dr. Whedon was more prudent. He would have so organized the anti-slavery movement as to please and conciliate the traffickers in human flesh. He was wiser even than the Son of God, whose imprudences of speech "solidified" the Jewish nation, and particularly the Scribes and Pharisees, "into hostile adamant," bringing upon himself thereby a cruel death. It is a pity that Dr. Whedon was not born early enough to teach "the man Christ Jesus" a better way. But he goes on: "Hence [i. e., because he offended the slaveholders], the great body of the best anti-slavery thinkers stood apart from him; and as these were generally Christian, Mr. Garrison and many of his followers grew rabid and hostile to evangelical Christianity. Infidels and semi-infidels gathered around him, opened their batteries on the churches, and availed themselves of the situation to discredit Christianity. Mr. Johnson's denunciation of the churches in his narrative is written somewhat after that model."

Are these statements true? Let us see. From 1832 to 1839-40 the Abolitionists, under the lead of Mr. Garrison, were a united body. The men referred to as "the best anti-slavery thinkers" were in close affinity with the movement. Moreover, the vast majority of the Abolitionists—including for a large portion of the time Mr. Garrison himself—were evangelical Christians. During this period there was no difference of opinion between Mr. Garrison and the class whom Dr. Whedon calls "the best anti-slavery thinkers," concerning the attitude of the American churches in respect to slavery. Those churches were denounced by Mr. Garrison no whit more severely than they were by eminent evangelical Christians, both clergymen and laymen. If there were any infidels or semi-infidels connected with the cause, they were to me unknown. On the contrary, I believe the "Boston Investigator," the infidel organ of that day, was just as hostile to the anti-slavery movement as the "Boston Recorder." If there was any striking of hands with infidelity, it was on the part not of the Abolitionists, but of their evangelical opponents. Indeed, during the whole history of the movement, with the single exception of that noble woman, Ernestine L. Rose, I do not remember a single prominent speaker on our platform who could truthfully have been called an infidel. Not that we should have failed to welcome their aid, but that like so many Christians of the period they were hostile or indifferent. In all those years the lecturing agents of the cause were for the most part evangelical men, many of them ministers or theological students. It was during these very years that "the slaveholders were solidified into hostile adamant," not more by Mr. Garrison than by Dr. Leavitt, James G. Birney, Amos A. Phelps, and scores of other evangelical men, who stood shoulder to shoulder with him.

The divisions of 1839-40, of which I shall give an account hereafter, did, indeed, take a large body of evangelical Abolitionists into the new organizations; but there were scores of others who remained with Mr. Garrison, and there was never a moment when more than one evangelical Christian was not found willing to serve the cause upon the executive committee of the American Anti-Slavery Society. After the division there was no change whatever on the part of Mr. Garrison and his friends toward the churches, whether evangelical or liberal; no new "opening of batteries" against them, and no assault upon their theological beliefs. The charge that Mr. Garrison and his associates "availed themselves of the situation to discredit Christianity" is wholly untrue. On the contrary, they honored Christianity while faithfully denouncing pro-slavery churches, and during most of the years when the pro-slavery press was branding them as infidels, they had the co-operation of that intensely orthodox body, the old-school Covenanters. The attempt to discredit what I have said in this work respecting the pro-slavery attitude of the churches, by the intimation that it is colored in the slightest degree by my theological views, is grossly unjust. I extenuate naught on the one hand, and on the other I set down naught in malice. My aim is to speak the exact truth without fear or favor. And in fact, I have said no more than I can prove by the most unimpeachable evangelical testimony. If Dr. Whedon attributes what I have said to hostility to evangelical religion, what will he say to this testimony of the Hon. William Jay, a distinguished member of the Protestant Episcopal church, and eminent during his life for piety and the love of Christian institutions? He was, moreover, I presume, one of "the best anti-slavery thinkers," to whom Dr. Whedon alludes as "standing apart" (after 1840) from Mr. Garrison. Writing in 1857,—twenty-three years after the period to which I referred, and when the churches had had ample time to correct any earlier mistakes,—Judge Jay says:—

"If we turn to the American church, a mournful scene meets our view. The church, whose office it is to distribute the bread of life, is scattering the apples of Sodom. . . . The northern church is, with rare exceptions, pursuing, in regard to slavery, a time-serving, man-pleasing policy, probably still more offensive to God than that of our pro-slavery politicians. The larger portion of our clergy, like the priest and Levite rebuked by our Lord, pass by on the other side, evincing neither sympathy for their wounded brother, nor indignation against his assailants; while others pass over to the thieves, bless them in the name of the Lord, and aid in robbing their helpless victim. Of all our northern churches, the Methodist has offered the most striking and painful illustration of the corrupting influence of political and ecclesiastical union with slaveholders. The hypocrisy of this church is melancholy and astounding. Founded as an anti-slavery church, and recording in its standards the most express condemnation of slavery as sinful, it became the unscrupulous tool of the slaveholders."

Would it not be more manly in Dr. Whedon, and others like him, to plead to this indictment, drawn by the hand of Judge Jay, than to endeavor to break the force of similar statements, made by Mr. Garrison and his friends, by unscrupulous and false accusations of infidelity, and of a "rabid hatred of evangelical Christianity"?

It gives me great pleasure to mention one Christian denomination, somewhat numerous in parts of New England, as well as in other States, that deserves to be excepted from the censures I have been compelled to bestow upon the rest. I allude to the Freewill Baptists, who, from the beginning, refused to receive slaveholders into communion, and most of whom were prompt to espouse the doctrine of immediate emancipation. The "Morning Star," the organ of the denomination, did much to inform public sentiment on the subject of slavery, especially in New Hampshire, where it had a large circulation. The constituency of this church was mainly among the common people, where its influence was chiefly felt. Its leaders refused to follow the example of other churches in countenancing slavery, and for this reason they incurred much censure and some persecution. It is not too much to say that it was more through the influence of the "Morning Star" than from any other cause, that the power of the pro-slavery Democracy in New Hampshire was first broken, and John P. Hale elected to the senate of the United States. That the Freewill Baptists were in all respects consistent and as earnest as they should have been in their testimony against slavery, it would be too much to affirm; but, compared with the churches around them, they were as light in the midst of darkness. If all other Christian denominations had come up to their level, the chains of the slaves might have been broken by moral power.

V.

The First Anti-Slavery Society — Differences Among Friends — Triumph of Principle over Expediency — The Anti-Slavery Twelve and their One Traitor — A Dismal but an Auspicious Night — The Quaker Hatter — The First Appeal to the Public — Dr. Beecher's Opposition — Emerson — Great Expectations and an Invincible Faith — Might of the Opposition — The Quakers — Cheering Words from Over the Sea.

MR. GARRISON, even before starting "The Liberator," looked to the organization of anti-slavery societies, at the earliest possible day, as a necessary means of advancing the cause. He knew something of the work which the Abolitionists of England were doing by this means, and longed to see their example followed in America. The subject was constantly in his mind, and he did not fail to urge it upon the attention of others. The great benevolent societies, formed under the auspices of the different religious denominations as a means of extending Christianity, were then just getting under way, and beginning to awaken the enthusiasm of the churches. Bible, tract, missionary and temperance associations were common, and the revivals of the period had awakened the hope in multitudes of Christian bosoms that the millennium was coming on apace. Dr. Lyman Beecher, then at the head of the evangelical clergy of New England, if not of America, was full of this theme, and his eloquent words stirred the churches as the blast of a trumpet stirs the hearts of an embattled host. Mr. Garrison's heart responded warmly to these appeals, but he saw, as the leaders of the church did not, that these dreams of the millennium could never be realized until slavery should be put out of the way. They, in their blindness, were afraid that any excitement on the subject of slavery would quench the influences of the Holy Spirit, stop revivals of religion, and paralyze the energies of the churches; while to his clearer vision it was manifest that slavery was the mightiest of all hindrances to the growth of Christianity, and that the guilty complicity of the pulpit and the church with the system would inevitably counteract their efforts for the spread of the gospel. He longed, therefore, to see anti-slavery societies organized by the score, and the whole country astir with anti-slavery excitement. But the tide ran heavily against him, and it was not till near the end of 1831 that any step toward organization was taken. On the 13th of November fifteen persons assembled in the office of Mr. Samuel E. Sewall, in State Street, to consider the subject. Of course these fifteen gentlemen were known to be warmly interested in the cause, and it was agreed in advance that we would form a society if the apostolic number of twelve should be found ready for the movement.

Of this little company Mr. Garrison was, of course, the central figure. He unfolded his purposes and plans without reserve, telling us what the Abolitionists of Great Britain had done since, under the inspiration of Elizabeth Heyrick, they had put their movement on the ground of immediate, in distinction from gradual, emancipation. He wanted societies formed in America upon the same principle, and could not be satisfied with any scheme of gradualism. The Rev. Samuel J. May was one of the gentlemen present, and in his "Recollections of the Anti-Slavery Conflict" (p. 31) he states that only nine of the number were believers in immediate emancipation. Upon this point my recollection differs from his. I believe every man present admitted the duty and safety of setting the slaves free at once; but six of the number doubted the wisdom of incorporating that principle into the constitution of the society, believing that it would excite popular prejudice, and thus tend to defeat the object in view. They thought it would be better to leave the question of immediatism open for a time, until public opinion could be enlightened, and to admit to membership gradualists as well as immediatists. Nor did they doubt that "whosoever retains his fellow-man in bondage is guilty of a grievous wrong," but they doubted the wisdom of saying so in the constitution of the society, as they thought it would repel from membership many whose co-operation was desirable. But Mr. Garrison was firm in the conviction that the vitality of the movement depended upon a frank avowal of fundamental principles, however unpopular they might be; and the vote upon the question showed that nine were in favor of organizing upon his plan, while six were opposed.

Another meeting was held at the same place on the 16th of December. Ten gentlemen were present, and, after considerable discussion, Messrs. David Lee Child, Samuel E. Sewall, William Lloyd Garrison, Ellis Gray Loring and Oliver Johnson were appointed a committee to draft a constitution for an Anti-Slavery Society, to be reported January 1, 1832. At the next meeting there was an additional attendance of Alonzo Lewis (known as the "Lynn Bard"), William J. Snelling (a man of some literary note), Dr. Abner Phelps, the Rev. Elijah Blanchard (editor of an anti-masonic religious paper) and Dr. Gamaliel Bradford. The body of the constitution reported by the committee was adopted, but the preamble was referred for revision to another committee, to be reported to an adjourned meeting to be held January 6, in the school-room under the African Baptist Church, in Belknap Street. Of that adjourned meeting my recollections are very vivid. A fierce north-east storm, combining snow, rain and hail in about equal proportions, was raging, and the streets were full of slush. They were dark too, for the city of Boston in those days was very economical of light on "Nigger Hill." It almost seemed as if nature was frowning upon the new effort to abolish slavery. But the spirits of the little company rose superior to all external circumstances. They knew that their cause was just, and that God and truth were on their side, and therefore nothing could discourage them. On that dismal night, and in the face of a public opinion fiercer far than the tempest of wind and hail that beat upon the windows of that "nigger school-house," were laid the foundations of an organized movement against American slavery that at last became too mighty to be resisted, and that drew into its wake the statesmanship as well as the piety and philanthropy of the country.

David Lee Child, editor of "The Massachusetts Journal," presided. The committee on the preamble to the constitution made its report. This preamble, as drawn by William J. Snelling, was in the following words:—

"We, the undersigned, hold that every person, of full age and sane mind, has a right to immediate freedom from personal bondage of whatsoever kind, unless imposed by the sentence of the law for the commission of some crime. We hold that man cannot, consistently with reason, religion and the eternal and immutable principles of justice, be the property of man. We hold that whoever retains his fellow-man in bondage is guilty of a grievous wrong. We hold that mere difference of complexion is no reason why any man should be deprived of any of his natural rights, or subjected to any political disability. While we advance these opinions as the principles on which we intend to act, we declare that we will not operate on the existing relations of society by other than peaceful and lawful means, and that we will give no countenance to violence or insurrection."

Behold in this the fanaticism, the incendiarism, and the infidelity of the anti-slavery movement, which the churches of America scorned and resisted, and against which American statesmanship arrayed itself in fiercest contempt and hostility! To the principles and spirit of the above preamble the Abolitionists were faithful from first to last. They assailed slavery in the name of God, of Christ and the Bible, and not an infidel sentiment was ever uttered from their platform.

The preamble was the subject of earnest discussion in the meeting. If I remember aright, no one denied its truth, but further doubts were expressed as to the expediency of putting the new society openly on the basis of immediate emancipation. Among those who took this view of the matter were David Lee Child, Samuel E. Sewall and Ellis Gray Loring, than whom there were no more earnest and devoted friends of the cause. The majority, however, adopted the preamble, and then the Constitution was presented for signatures. Twelve persons (all white) signed it, as follows:

William Lloyd Garrison, Oliver Johnson, Robert B. Hall, Arnold Buffum, William J. Snelling, John E. Fuller, Moses Thacher, Joshua Coffin, Stillman B. Newcomb, Benjamin C. Bacon, Isaac Knapp, Henry K. Stockton.

Of these twelve men I was the youngest, and I am probably the only one now living. Messrs. Child, Sewall and Loring refused their names at that time, but they joined the society shortly afterward, and were among its most useful and influential members. Of the twelve original signers, I believe there were not more than one or two who could have put a hundred dollars into the treasury without bankrupting themselves! The society was called "The New England Anti-Slavery Society." It was the first association ever organized in this country upon the principle of immediate abolition, and the parent of the numerous other affiliated associations which in the next few years created an anti-slavery agitation that shook the land from end to end. The preamble, sound as it was in principle, did not prove quite satisfactory, and its form was changed at the end of the first year. The first officers of the society were: Arnold Buffum (a Quaker), President; First Vice-President, George C. Odiorne, a Boston merchant; Second Vice-President, Alonzo Lewis, the "Lynn Bard"; Corresponding Secretary, William Lloyd Garrison; Recording Secretary, Joshua Coffin, antiquarian (Whittier's schoolmaster); Treasurer, Michael H. Simpson; Counselors, Moses Thacher, John E. Fuller, Oliver Johnson, Robert B. Hall, Benjamin C. Bacon and Samuel E. Sewall. These were respectable, but neither eminent nor popular names, and I remember how their insignificance was often contrasted with the long list of statesmen and divines that constituted the official board of the Colonization Society. It was thought to be excessively ludicrous that a small association of "nobodies" should be talking of abolishing American slavery, when the great body of the people believed that the scheme was utterly impracticable. The Rev. Joshua N. Danforth, agent of the Colonization Society, often took occasion to sneer at "the men with more blood than brains," who, under the lead of Arnold Buffum, "the Quaker hatter," had undertaken a job from which the great statesmen and divines of the country shrank in utter dismay. In the then state of public opinion such appeals to prejudice were exceedingly effective. But those who made them should have remembered the words of Paul: "The foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. . . . Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise ; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty ; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are ; that no flesh should glory in his presence."

As the little company that formed the new society were stepping out into the storm and darkness from the African school-house, where their work was accomplished, Mr. Garrison impressively remarked : " We have met to-night in this obscure school-house ; our numbers are few and our influence limited ; but, mark my prediction, Faneuil Hall shall ere long echo with the principles we have set forth. We shall shake the Nation by their mighty power." I well remember those words as they fell from the lips of our great leader, but I am indebted for their preservation to my friend, the late Benjamin C. Bacon, among whose private memoranda they were found after his death, and who doubtless wrote them down shortly after they were uttered. How well the prophecy they contain has been fulfilled I need not say.

If our cause, like Christianity, started with the union of twelve men, so also, our twelve, like that of Jesus, had its one traitor. The man to whom I allude was then a theological student. After entering the ministry he found the cross of abolitionism too heavy to bear, as it interfered with his clerical ambitions, and so he threw it off. It was not long afterward that he was compelled, by charges affecting his moral character, to leave the ministry. He did not, however, like Judas, go out and hang himself, but after some years got elected to Congress as a " Know-Nothing." I am glad to say that while a member of that body he so far returned to the faith of his earlier years as to vote right upon the anti-slavery issues of the time.

The first thing which the new society did was to make an appeal in a public address to the people of New England. That appeal was written by the Rev. Moses Thacher, one of the original "twelve," and the editor of "The Boston Telegraph." In theology he was of the school of Emmons, and wielded a powerful pen. The address was alike strong in argument and felicitous in style, and fitted in every way to stir the heart of the reader. Mr. Thacher subsequently left New England and became a minister of the Presbyterian Church, in whose service he died about two years ago.

On the Fourth of July, 1831, the church of which Dr. Beecher was the pastor held a morning meeting for prayer, and the Doctor made an address, exhorting his hearers to support the Colonization Society, and sneering at "the few foolish whites" who were opposing it, and advocating the immediate emancipation of the slaves, "reckless of consequences." The good Doctor thought it quite feasible to deport the whole black population of the United States to Africa, but ridiculed as impracticable the idea of emancipating the slaves upon the soil. Mr. Garrison, who was a member of his congregation, answered him in "The Liberator," in part as follows:—

"After all, I think it will be easy to prove that the Doctor is not more sapient than immediate Abolitionists. I never knew him to be wise enough in his pulpit to tell his hearers that if they were habitually guilty of drunkenness, of exercising cruelty, of stealing property, of committing adultery, they must refrain from these crimes gradually, and aim at an uncertain, indefinite, far-off reformation. Such a doctrine might quiet the consciences and tickle the ears of drunkards, tyrants, thieves and debauchees; but it would hardly be tolerated, even from the lips of Lyman Beecher, by the worshippers in Bowdoin Street meeting-house. Now, slavery is a violation of every natural right; it is a system of robbery, adultery, cruelty and murder; and its perpetuity justly exposes the nation to the wrath of Heaven.

Yet he is foolish, in the Doctor's estimation, who tells the slaveholders to leave off their sins at once, and to be, to-day, honest and humane men. For one, I cannot listen to any proposal for a gradual abolition of wickedness."

Mr. Garrison also reminded the Doctor that among "the foolish whites" who were "madly" calling for the immediate abolition of slavery might be reckoned a very large majority of the wisest and best men in Great Britain, including Clarkson, Wilberforce, Brougham, Lushington, Stephen and O'Connell; and the most eminent clergymen of all denominations. I refer to this only as illustrating the way in which the contest between the Abolitionists and the Church went on; for in reality Dr. Beecher spoke for the latter as really as Mr. Garrison did for the former. Their encounter was but an epitome of the whole argument between the two parties, and which of them has most occasion to blush in view of the record it is needless to say.

After what I have said of the degeneracy of the Boston clergy in those days, it is pleasant to record the fact that Ralph Waldo Emerson, then pastor of a Unitarian church in that city, on Sunday evening, May 29, 1831, had the courage to open his pulpit for the delivery of an anti-slavery sermon by the Rev. Samuel J. May. What a powerful influence Mr. Emerson afterward exerted in moulding the public opinion that led to the abolition of slavery every intelligent American knows.

The new society began its work with a brave heart, in the full belief that success would ere long crown its exertions. In social influence, as well as in pecuniary resources, it was indeed almost ludicrously weak; but in the strength of its principles, and in the firmness of its faith in God, it was not only mighty, but invincible. They remembered (those infidels!) the truth afterward so vigorously expressed by Theodore Parker: "Truth is a part of the celestial machinery of God, and whoso puts that machinery in gear for mankind hath the Almighty to turn his wheel." But while on the one hand they were fully sensible that they had undertaken no holiday task, they were upon the other but feebly conscious of the power which slavery had acquired over the American Government and the American churches, and little aware of the amount of persecution and self-denial they would be called to endure. If they had known the worst, would their courage have been adequate to the work, or would they have shrunk back in utter despair? God only knows. Their weakness, whatever it may have been, was not unknown to Him, and it may have been His design to enlist them in the work, and then to develop their courage and devotion by such experiences as they were prepared to endure, until they should become capable at length of bearing all that would come upon them in their long and bitter struggle. In all great movements for the overthrow of giant evils this seems to be the way of Providence. If the leaders of the Protestant Reformation had foreseen all the suffering they would be called to endure, would their courage have been equal to their day? And if the fathers of our Republic had known from the start that they could establish their rights only by a long and bloody war with the mightiest nation on the globe, and by a complete severance of the political ties that bound them to the mother country, might they not have shrunk appalled from so mighty and so doubtful a task? In these, and in a hundred other similar instances, no doubt, men rushed with impetuous but honest impulse into a righteous contest, gaining the required courage and devotion as the fight went on, until at last they became invincible. In all such contests how many run well for a season, and then, unable to bear the cross, become stragglers and deserters! The anti-slavery movement, in this respect, was no exception to the general rule. Many a man who fought well so long as he felt sure that the victory would be speedily won, fell out of the ranks when he found that the battle would be fierce and long. It would be easy to give the names of some of these deserters, but I will not thus rescue them from deserved oblivion.

It seems ludicrous now, but I remember that the least enthusiastic of our number thought it would not take more than ten years at the utmost to abolish slavery! With the Declaration of Independence and the Bible, and God himself, on our side, how could the contest be any longer protracted? Our simplicity will seem all the more wonderful when it is remembered that we looked for emancipation through moral forces alone, and through the conversion of the slaveholders themselves to our doctrines. Our expectation, in spite of first untoward appearances, was, that the American Church and pulpit would be speedily enlisted on our side, that the free discussion of the subject would be at length tolerated in the South, and that the moral influences thus set in play would soon prevail over all opposition. How could the slaveholders long resist the evidence that slavery was not only wrong, but positively injurious to their best interests? With a free press pouring the light of truth into every dark place in the land, with the pulpit summoning the nation to repentance for its sin, with the churches overflowing with sympathy for the slave and bearing a faithful testimony against his wrongs, and with the voices of enlightened statesmen pleading for the right, how was it possible that the victory could be long delayed? Alas, alas! how little we then dreamed that slavery was to find in the pulpits and churches — then on fire with zeal for the conversion of the world to Christ — its chief bulwarks; that the authorized expounders of the Bible would “torture its hallowed pages” to show that slaveholding, instead of being sinful, was perfectly compatible with a Christian profession; that from Andover and Princeton and the other high places of the church would go forth voices to cheer and comfort the holders of slaves; that even the Golden Rule of the blessed Christ would be perverted by a New England Bishop to the service of slavery; that hundreds of pulpits would venture to mix the Bible's "bitter texts" against oppression "with relish suited to the sinner's taste"; that presbyteries, synods, associations, conventions and other ecclesiastical assemblies, and even the missionary bodies of the church, instead of pleading for the oppressed, would "daub with untempered mortar" in the service of the oppressor; that slaveholding preachers would find ready and approved access to Northern pulpits, while ministers advocating emancipation would be proscribed as fanatics; that the holders of slaves would be admitted without objection to Northern communion-tables, which the negro Christian could only approach as a pariah; and that the religious press, with few exceptions, would lend itself to the service of slavery. How blind we were to the fact that the Government, in every vein and artery, and even in its very heart, was poisoned by the insidious virus of slavery; that the Constitution itself was fatally infected; that our legislative, executive, judicial and diplomatic proceedings were largely under the sway of the slave power, ever watchful to advance its own interests; that the political parties were bound hand and foot to the ponderous wheels of the modern juggernaut; and that our statesmen, while eager to . . . Send, with lavish breath,

 Their sympathies across the wave,
 Where manhood, on the field of death,
 Struck for his freedom or a grave;

to plead warmly and eloquently

For Greece, the Moslem fetter spurning,
 And Poland, gasping on her lance—would yet stand dumb before American slavery and its abominations, or open their mouths only to equivocate and palter and stultify themselves!

The first thing that the new society did was to commission its Quaker president, Arnold Buffum, as a lecturing agent, with the understanding that he should collect his own small salary, and as much more as possible. Mr. Buffum was then in the prime of life, a man of excellent judgment, well versed in his subject, and withal a pleasant and quite an effective speaker. His Quaker dress and speech were accepted in some quarters as an adequate excuse for his Abolitionism, and so were an aid to him in his work. He had been in England but a few years before, and made the acquaintance of Clarkson, Wilberforce and others of the anti-slavery leaders, from whose experience and instruction he had gained some valuable lessons. In some quarters he met with an encouraging reception, and succeeded in gathering fair audiences, that gave him respectful attention. Occasionally he found a clergyman willing to open a church or vestry to him without charge. In other places he was able to procure the use of a public hall at small expense. The opposition had not yet had time to organize itself, though public prejudice was in many places very strong, and the tone of the press far from friendly. In spite of many adverse influences, Mr. Buffum's lectures were a good beginning of the work that needed to be done. He frequently encountered the agents of the Colonization Society, never failing to give them battle as the chief apologists of slavery, who denounced immediate emancipation as fanaticism, and declared that slaves should be set free only upon condition of being exiled to Africa. The popularity of this Society arose from the fact that it humored the popular prejudice against the negro as an inferior being, and did not claim for him the rights accorded to white men. "Negro" then was almost universally spelled with two g's, and with this orthography it embodied a measure of contempt from which all manly and Christian sympathy and all reverence for human nature were eliminated. If the slaves had been so many wild beasts, people could not more coolly, or with less consciousness of cruelty in so doing, have denied to them the rights of men. Indeed, it was almost universally assumed that they were beasts in passion and revenge, and, if set free, would cut the throats of their emancipators! Slaves with white skins might be set free on the instant with perfect safety; but black slaves were so many wolves, held by the ears by their unfortunate masters, who could not let go without being devoured. The primary difference between the Abolitionists and their opponents lay in the fact that the former asserted, while the latter denied, the perfect humanity of the negro. It was this that made the anti-slavery movement dangerous in the eyes of the slaveholders — this that commended the Colonization Society to their favor and support. Mr. Buffum, true-hearted Quaker that he was, understood this perfectly, and therefore was able to strike effective blows. He was at once gentle and bold, cautious and faithful. He would not extenuate nor set down aught in malice.

“The gentle words which hung
Like a string of pearls from his cautious lip,
On their silver thread, he was fain to clip,
Lest something more than the truth might slip,
For once, from a Quaker's tongue.”

Such a man could not but exert a wholesome influence in the face of even such prejudices as he was compelled to encounter. He might have accomplished still more if the sect to which he belonged had given him its sympathy and support — nay, if it had not brought its strong social and ecclesiastical influences to bear against him. He became a mark for javelins stealthily hurled by false brethren. The Quaker sect, as such, was worshipping in the "house of Rimmon" like all the rest, its ears filled with cotton, its heart unresponsive to the cry of the slave. A few tender-hearted and noble members of the society were true to its principles and traditions, and these espoused the cause with zeal; but those who sat in high places and ruled the denomination discountenanced the movement, taking sides practically and effectively with the opposition. Quaker meeting-houses, except in a few instances, were sternly closed against anti-slavery lecturers, and members who attended anti-slavery meetings were often labored with as those who had strayed from the true path. The ground assumed by the leaders was that Quakers ought to keep by themselves and not mingle with "the world's people" in philanthropic work; that the Abolitionists were not truly inspired, but attempting to abolish slavery in their own strength, and that to pay men for lecturing against it was contrary to the Quaker testimony against a "hireling ministry." Talk like this was in many places the burden of Quaker preaching, and it was as effectual in its influence upon the sect as open defences and apologies for slavery were in other denominations. But Mr. Buffum, though he became of no reputation among his brethren, and though he felt this opposition and detraction very keenly, never faltered for a moment, but held on his way until, in subsequent years, the sect would gladly have blotted out all traces of its unfriendly course toward him. Others, too, were equally faithful. How invaluable and inspiring were the songs Whittier poured forth, heedless of the dominant influences of the society, I need not say. He began early and continued even unto the end, and since the days of George Fox no man has done more than he to commend Quaker principles to the admiration of the world, or reflected higher honor upon the Quaker name. The name of Whittier indeed is a bright star in the Quaker firmament, to which every member of the society now points with a pride that rebukes the degeneracy of an earlier day. "Well, Perez, I hope thee's done running after the Abolitionists," said a high-seat Friend to one of his humbler brethren. "Verily, I have," said Perez; "I've caught up with and gone just a little ahead of them." There were a goodly number of men like Perez, in the society, after all.

At the time when the New England Anti-Slavery Society was formed, the movement in Great Britain against slavery in the West Indies was nigh its culmination. The whole kingdom was shaken by the eloquence of Wilberforce, Brougham, O'Connell, Thompson and others. The English press was full of the subject; but such was the power of slavery over the American press that the people here knew hardly more of the progress of the movement than they did of what was going on in the wilds of Africa. Some few rays of light did now and then steal into American minds from that source, but they were not sufficient to produce any wide illumination. American newspapers were afraid to print the truth lest it should help the Abolitionists, while the Abolitionists themselves, with their limited resources, were unable to give it any wide currency. Mr. Garrison was the recipient, now and then, of a batch of anti-slavery publications from England, by which his own heart was cheered, and which he used for the benefit of the cause in this country. Well do I remember with what emotions I first read in "The Liberator," where it appeared for the first time in America, the following passage from a speech by Lord Brougham:—

"Tell me not of rights — talk not of the property of the planter in his slaves. I deny the right — I acknowledge not the property. The principles, the feelings of our common nature rise in rebellion against it. Be the appeal made to the understanding or the heart, the sentence is the same that rejects it. In vain you tell me of the laws that sanction such a claim! There is a law above all the enactments of human codes — the same throughout the world, the same in all times — such it was before the daring genius of Columbus pierced the night of ages, and opened to one world the sources of power, wealth and knowledge, to another all unutterable woes; such as it is at this day. It is the law written by the finger of God on the heart of man; and by that law, unchangeable and eternal, while men despise fraud, and loathe rapine, and abhor blood, they shall reject with indignation the wild and guilty fantasy that man can hold property in man.”

While the hearts of British citizens and Christians were stirred by appeals like this from statesmen of renown, and by orators, ministers and philanthropists of every sort, the statesmen and the divines of America were weaving defences and apologies for slavery out of the Bible and the Constitution, thus leading the country toward the retribution that afterwards befel in the catastrophe of the Southern Rebellion.

VI.

Colorphobia Illustrated — Its Meanness and Cruelty — Doctors Gurvey and Bacon — A Contrast — The Nat Turner Insurrection — Discussion in Virginia — Why it Failed to Accomplish Anything — Power of Immediatism as a Principle.

WHEN it is remembered that the New England Anti-Slavery Society sought not only to free the slaves but to "improve the character and condition of the free people of color," it may seem strange that among those who took part in its formation there was not a single individual of the latter class. But the fact is easily explained. It was not from any lack of interest on their part in the movement, for they saw in it a bright star of promise for their race, and thanked God for the sight. They had rallied, at least the most intelligent among them, to the support of "The Liberator," and were indulging in bright dreams of speedy deliverance from civil and social proscription. Why then were they not conspicuous among the formers of the new society? It was because they instinctively knew that their presence and co-operation would serve only to increase and intensify the prejudices which the society must encounter. Their very anxiety for its success kept them aloof at first. They were careful not to embarrass in its infancy a movement on which were staked their dearest hopes. Anglo-Saxon prejudice against the negro is strong even yet, but it is weak compared with what it was then. No man with a black skin could enter a Christian church without consenting to the degradation of the "nigger pew." He could not ride in any public conveyance on terms of equality with others. A very intelligent colored girl, the daughter of a devoted and useful clergyman of Boston, was suddenly summoned to the bedside of a dying relative in New Hampshire. A seat was bespoken for her in the stage, then the only means of public conveyance; but the driver, on coming to the door and finding that she was a negro, cracked his whip with an accompanying oath and drove off without her. A colored man of Boston, in trading with a white man, became the owner of a pew in the central aisle of the Park Street Church, and, thinking he might be profited by the ministrations of an intelligent white minister, went to it one Sunday morning with his family. They listened to the "stated preaching of the Gospel" for once under the gaze of a whole battery of frowning faces; but they were not permitted to enjoy the privilege a second time. The trustees of the church found some technicality by which to deprive the black man of his legal rights. His appearance and that of his family in that fashionable house of worship was accounted by all Boston as an outrage scarcely less flagrant than would have been the use of the pew as a pigpen. A colored merchant from Liberia, a man of intelligence as well as wealth, and highly esteemed by Colonizationists, being on a visit to Boston, took the opportunity of making the acquaintance of the Abolitionists. As he wished to hear Dr. Beecher preach, I invited him, as an act of courtesy to a distinguished foreigner, to take a seat in my pew. On my way out of church I encountered the indignant frowns of a large number of the congregation; but it was amusing to witness the change of countenance that fell upon the advocates of colonization as I introduced to them "Mr. —, of Liberia." They really seemed to think his odor was not quite so offensive, after all, as they had suspected. The air of Liberia was such a powerful disinfectant! The slaveholders used to think the atmosphere of their homes was perfectly delectable when slaves in kitchen, dining-room, parlor and boudoir were as all-pervading as flies; but there was no odor so offensive to them as that imparted to a "negro" when he was set free; and Northern people in the days of slavery, while they required the free negro to occupy a separate apartment on steamboat and rail-car, as being personally offensive to white olfactories, never thought of remonstrating when the slaveholders (in the hot summer weather, too!) claimed for their slaves all the privileges of first-class travellers. Strange that in a republican country freedom was so offensive, while slavery was so fragrant!

The meanness and cruelty of this hateful race prejudice, as it was often manifested in that day, was simply indescribable. A bright colored lad belonging to my class in Sunday school, in 1831, said to me, sadly, in reply to my efforts to awaken in him an ambition for self-improvement, "What's the use in my attempting to improve myself, when, do what I may, I can never be anything but a nigger?" I tried to cheer this boy, to kindle some hope in his breast, by reminding him that a few good men were struggling to deliver him and his unfortunate race from their terrible surroundings; and I am glad to say that he became an honorable and useful man, and during the later years of his life he was a faithful servant of the United States in the Post Office Department. In that day no colored boy could be apprenticed to any trade in any shop where white men worked; still less could he find a place, except as a menial, in any store or office. I well remember what amazement was excited when Mr. Garrison and his partner first took a black boy as an apprentice in the office of "The Liberator." It was declared on every side that no "nigger" could learn the art of printing, and it was held to be evidence of arrant folly to try the experiment. If the negroes, under such circumstances, sometimes seemed dull and even stupid, who can wonder? What race or class of men is strong enough to keep its feet under such a load of prejudice and contumely? The wonder is that the negroes bore it so patiently and cheerfully, keeping alive in their souls the hope of a better day to come, when the hearts of Christians should be purged from the foul spirit of caste. They could not have done it if God had not made them gentle, patient and forgiving above almost every other class of the human family. The worst of it all was that the prejudice was defended in pulpit and press as natural and therefore justifiable. The scheme of African colonization rested upon it as its corner-stone. If it had pleased God, in a night to give the slaves a white skin, every man in the United States would have arisen from his bed the next morning a flaming Abolitionist. No need of any colonies then, in Africa or elsewhere, and no danger that the slaves, if set free, would cut the throats of their masters. Every excuse and apology for slavery would have been instantly swept away, and no premium for a text of Scripture to support it would have been of any avail, for no theological professor would have dared in that case to torture the Bible, even for a reward.

Mr. Garrison won the grateful confidence of the free colored people, not more by demanding the instant emancipation of the slaves than by his uncompromising assaults upon the spirit of caste. In short, his recognition of the humanity of the negro was unqualified and complete, and he was firmly resolved to content himself with nothing less than the admission of that, alike in principle and practice. He made open war upon an old statute of Massachusetts inflicting a fine of $50 upon any person who should join in marriage any white person with any negro, Indian or mulatto. He saw that this statute set a stigma upon the negro, and therefore demanded its repeal. Perhaps of all his acts this was for a time the most unpopular. The press poured upon it unmeasured ridicule and scorn, denouncing him as an "amalgamationist," and in the Legislature the petitions for repeal were at first treated with contempt. But every year they were repeated, until at last reason prevailed, and the obnoxious statute was repealed. Upon this question he would not equivocate, he would not excuse, he would not retreat a single inch, and his voice was finally heard and obeyed. It was this uncompromising spirit, this absolute devotion to principle, that distinguished him above other men, and made his influence so irresistible. How surely, even if slowly, does the world yield to the might of such a man! The tides obey the moon no more implicitly — the law of gravitation is not more certain in its operation.

"Men of a thousand shifts and wiles, look here!
 See one straightforward conscience put in pawn
 To win a world! See the obedient sphere
 By bravery's simple gravitation drawn!"

If there was among the colored people at first some distrust of the new movement, we need not wonder, since they had so often found themselves deceived by the spurious professions and promises of white men. The Colonization Society was even then exerting its influence, under spurious professions of friendliness toward them, to make their lot harder, and to compel them to take their choice between permanent degradation in their own country and exile to the inhospitable shores of barbarous Africa. "The African Repository," the organ of that society, declared: "The habits, the feelings, the prejudices of society — prejudices which neither refinement, nor argument, nor education, nor religion itself can subdue — mark the people of color, whether bond or free, as the subjects of a degradation inevitable and incurable. The African in this country belongs by birth to the very lowest station in society, and from that station he can never rise, be his talents, his enterprise, his virtues what they may. Here, therefore, they must be forever debased; more than this, they must be forever useless; more even than this, they must be forever a nuisance, from which it were a blessing for society to be rid." These words, so insulting to the very spirit of Christianity, and so full of baldest atheism, were written by a clergyman educated in New England, the Rev. Ralph Randolph Gurley, Secretary of the American Colonization Society; and what is still worse, they expressed the sentiments of a vast majority of Northern Christians. The Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon, of New Haven, then the leading champion of Colonization in New England, described the negro population of the country in "The Christian Spectator" — a magazine of large influence — as a class "which, even if it were not literally enslaved, must forever remain in a state of degradation no better than bondage. Here a slave cannot be really emancipated. You cannot raise him from the abyss of his degradation. You may call him free, you may enact a statute-book of laws to make him free, but you cannot bleach him into the enjoyment of freedom." It was just as natural as breathing that the man who thought there was no power in Christianity to overcome complexional and race prejudices, should be an apologist for slavery; and so we need not be surprised to find Dr. Bacon saying: "The Bible contains no explicit prohibition of slavery. There is neither chapter nor verse of Holy Writ which lends any countenance to the fulminating spirit of universal emancipation, of which some exhibitions may be seen in some of the newspapers." What then did Isaiah mean when he told the people of Israel to "break every yoke," and "let the oppressed go free"? And what did Jesus mean when he said he had been anointed to "preach deliverance to the captives, and to set at liberty them that are bruised"? Were expressions like these intended to suggest the duty of a distant and gradual breaking of the fetters of the enslaved, and to stigmatize as fanatical "fulminations" the demands for immediate emancipation?

Let no one suppose that I cite these utterances of Dr. Gurley and Dr. Bacon for any personal reason whatever. I might fill whole pages with similar extracts from the leading divines and statesmen of that day. Dr. Bacon, then a young man of ripe culture and highest promise, simply spoke the prevailing sentiment of the time—a sentiment which he afterward unlearned and repudiated. I am simply trying to make clear to my readers of the present generation the darkness, ignorance and moral degeneracy against which the early Abolitionists had to contend. There are those who, in the fancied interest of Christianity, would cover up these ugly blotches upon the escutcheon of the American church and clergy, and lead posterity to the conclusion that it was the so-called fanaticism and infidelity of the Abolitionists that repelled Christian sympathy and support. As God is just, all such attempts will be vain. The ugly facts cannot be concealed, and they ought not to be if they could. Like the words written upon the wall of Belshazzar's palace, they should be emblazoned in history as a warning to men and nations in all coming time to obey the voice of God and respect the rights of human nature; and, still further, as a warning that the true character of Christianity is to be sought, not in the churches bearing the name while they are false to the spirit of the Master, but in His own life and teachings, now and evermore. Let God and Christ be true, though all men are condemned as liars!

In contrast with the atheistic postulate cited above, that Christianity could do nothing for the negro in America, and that Providence had doomed him to inevitable degradation so long as he should foolishly persist in sharing the advantages and blessings of our glorious republic, let me quote a few sentences from Mr. Garrison. Referring to the very passages above quoted, and to others of a similar character, Mr. Garrison, writing in 1832, said:—

“Search the records of heathenism, and sentiments more hostile to the spirit of the Gospel, or of a more black and blasphemous complexion than these, cannot be found. I believe that they are libels upon the character of my countrymen, which time will wipe off. I call upon the spirits of the just made perfect in heaven, upon all who have experienced the love of God in their souls here below, upon the Christian converts in India and the islands of the sea, to sustain me in the assertion that there is power enough in the religion of Jesus Christ to melt down the most stubborn prejudices, to overthrow the highest walls of partition, to break the strongest caste, to improve and elevate the most degraded, to unite in fellowship the most hostile, and to equalize and bless all its recipients. Make me sure that there is not, and I will give it up, now and forever.

“My countrymen! are you willing to be held up as tyrants and hypocrites forever? as less magnanimous and just than the population of Europe? No—no! I cannot give you up as incorrigibly wicked, nor my country as sealed over to destruction. My confidence remains like the oak—like the Alps—unshaken, storm-proof. I am not discouraged; I am not distrustful. I still place an unwavering reliance upon the omnipotence of truth. I still believe that the demands of justice will be satisfied; that the voice of bleeding humanity will melt the most obdurate heart; and that the land will be redeemed and regenerated by an enlightened and energetic public opinion. As long as there remains among us a single copy of the Declaration of Independence, or of the New Testament, I will not despair of the social and political elevation of my black countrymen.”

Let the reader compare these words of Garrison with those of Doctors Gurley and Bacon, and judge for himself whether the latter or the former accord most perfectly with the spirit of Christianity.

I have already alluded to the Nat Turner insurrection of August, 1831; but I mention it again to call attention to the great debate to which it led in the Virginia Legislature, in the session of 1831-2. That debate was remarkable for the confessions it elicited as to the character and the cruel wrongs of slavery, and for the utter moral helplessness in dealing with it exhibited by the leading men of the State. Nothing that Garrison had said or could say of the evils of slavery exceeded what slaveholders themselves confessed in the course of this debate. Mr. Broadnax, forgetting that the people of Virginia had brought it upon themselves in defiance of God's law, described it as the "greatest curse that God in his wrath ever inflicted upon a people." Mr. Bolling said it was "the bane of our happiness, the most pernicious of all the evils with which the body politic can be afflicted." Mr. Chandler declared it to be "the greatest curse that has ever been inflicted upon the State." Mr. Moore said it was "the severest calamity that has ever befallen any portion of the human race," and that "its irresistible tendency was to undermine and destroy everything like virtue and morality in the community." Mr. Faulkner spoke of it as "that bitterest drop from the chalice of the destroying angel," and said the country was "groaning under the heaviest and blackest curse that ever afflicted freemen." Mr. Summers wished "to arrest the desolating scourge of our country, to save after ages from the accumulated ills of a then hopeless and remediless disease." Mr. Berry said it was "a cancer on the body politic, as certain, steady and fatal in its progress as any cancer on the physical system;" and Mr. McDowell, afterwards Governor of the State, said it was "not the fear of Nat Turner and his deluded, drunken handful of followers" that had so excited the people — "it was the suspicion eternally attached to the slave himself — a suspicion that a Nat Turner might be in every family, that the same bloody deed might be acted over at any time and in any place, that the materials for it were spread through the land, and were always ready for a like explosion."

It is impossible to doubt the sincerity of these men. They lived in the midst of slavery, most of them were slaveholders, and they all saw and felt how dangerous the system was, and how destructive of the very foundations of morality and prosperity. Why then did they not attack it boldly and insist upon its immediate abolition? It was because they were under the delusion, common in that day, and from which only a few Abolitionists had just been delivered, that, bad as slavery was, immediate emancipation would be worse; that the slaves, on being set free, would turn in vengeance upon the masters and give themselves up to riot and bloodshed. This delusion was long an absolute protection of slavery in communities where the slaves were numerous and where its strongest opponents dared not so much as hint its absolute sinfulness, or propose any other than an exceedingly gradual plan of emancipation. With what power these Virginians would have been clothed, if, seeing the terrible injustice of slavery and the dangers attending it, they had also seen with equal clearness that it would be perfectly safe to set every slave instantly free! But they were weak as water, while the champions of slavery, for the time-being, had all the advantages of a fortified position. If the former had been as willing to have "the way of God expounded more perfectly unto them" by Garrison and Elizabeth Heyrick as the Jew Apollos was to learn of Aquila and Priscilla, they might have demolished the fortifications of the slaveholders and beaten them on the open field; instead of which they were themselves utterly routed and silenced, and Virginia thenceforth bound hand and foot by the Slave Power, and given over to work the "iniquity" of slavery and the domestic slave-trade "with greediness." The men who had dared to assail slavery, and who afterward aspired to public station, were compelled to eat their own words, and thus descend to the same level with those who openly declared, with Mr. Gholson, that "the right of the slaveholder to his female slaves and their increase, was the same as that to his brood mares and their products."

To this vulgar complexion it came at last, and the State of Washington and Jefferson was not ashamed to owe her wealth chiefly to the profits derived from the sale of slaves, deliberately raised for the market like so many colts and calves! If Garrison's plea for immediate emancipation had been taken up and enforced by the Northern church and pulpit, the "mother of Presidents" might have been saved from this degradation, and the freedom of the slaves assured without the bloody arbitrament of a war that filled the land with mourning and woe. Never in all history was there another delusion so preposterous and absurd as that which affirmed that it was dangerous to free the slaves from their bonds. Not only was the delusion contrary to common sense, and a libel upon human nature and God, but its foolishness had been demonstrated again and again by actual experiment, as it was three years later by the results of emancipation in the British West Indies. If Mr. Garrison, like his predecessors in the cause, had been a gradualist, attributing the sin of slavery (as the Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon did) to "those and those only who bore a part in originating such a constitution of society," and assigning the duty of emancipation to distant generations, he would have been as powerless as those bewildered denouncers of slavery in the Virginia Legislature, and his movement would have come to naught. A good general is careful in selecting the ground upon which to fight the enemy; above all he avoids placing his army in a quagmire, where it can have no sound footing. The same principle is as important in moral as in physical warfare, and Garrison was wiser than his generation in that he saw that gradualism was a slough in which many a well-meaning band of reformers had been swallowed up, and that it would be useless to assail slavery on any other ground than that of its utter sinfulness and the duty of every slaveholder instantly to emancipate his slaves. God's law of eternal justice and righteousness must be uplifted and honored, and men must be made to understand the folly and wickedness of the assumption that obedience to that law is not safe. To attempt to abolish slavery while one's own mouth was filled with apologies for it as a system for which the generation then upon the stage was in no way responsible, and from which there was no way of present escape, would be idle.

It was the doctrine of immediate emancipation that imbued Garrison's arm with strength, and that made all the difference between success and failure in the movement he organized. As Wendell Phillips, standing over his coffin, said: "He seems to have understood—this boy without experience—he seems to have understood by instinct that righteousness is the only thing which will finally compel submission; that one, with God, is always a majority. He seems to have known at the very outset, taught of God, the herald and champion, God-endowed and God-sent to arouse a nation, that only by the most absolute assertion of the uttermost truth, without qualification or compromise, can a nation be waked to conscience or strengthened for duty."

It was the custom in that day to inveigh against immediatism as "impracticable." "You cannot," said our opponents, "emancipate all the slaves at once; why, then, do you propose so impossible a scheme?" Our reply was, that slaveholding being a sin, instant emancipation was the right of every slave and the duty of every master. The fact that the slaveholders were not ready at once to obey the demands of justice and the requirements of the Divine Law militated not against the soundness of the doctrine of immediatism or against its power as a PRACTICAL WORKING PRINCIPLE. The minister of the Gospel does not cease to proclaim the duty of immediate repentance for sin because he knows that his message will not be immediately heeded. It is his duty to contend for sound principles, whether his auditors "will hear or forbear." He dares not advise or encourage them to delay repentance for a single hour, though he knows that in all probability many of them will do so until their dying day.

The fanaticism of the Abolitionists consisted in applying to the sin of slavery the general principle which they had learned from the American pulpit. There was no impracticability in the scheme of immediate emancipation save that which arose from the determination of the slaveholders to persist in their sin, and from the encouragement they received at the hands of men who made themselves partakers in their iniquity. Even at this day, after all the light shed upon the subject from the results of emancipation in the West Indies, and in the face of the recorded testimony of Clarkson and Wilberforce, Brougham and O'Connell, and other eminent philanthropists, there are men of eminence in the church who pronounce immediate emancipation "a fantastic abstraction," and seek to cast reproach upon American Abolitionists for advocating a doctrine so wild and impracticable. But the slaveholders, who had seen many a scheme of gradualism come to naught, knew right well that the voice of Garrison, pleading for the right of every slave to instant freedom, would, unless it could be silenced, prove the knell of their hateful system.

VII.

Battle with the Colonization Society — Garrison's "Thoughts" — An Indictment with Ten Counts — Discussion — Mr. Garrison gives the Colored People a Hearing — Attempt to Found a Negro College in New Haven — The Town Thrown into an Uproar — The Project Defeated — The Canterbury Disgrace — The Burleigh Brothers — Why Windham County is Republican.

MR. GARRISON, when he joined Lundy in Baltimore, was a mild Colonizationist. Without investigating the subject for himself, he took it for granted that a scheme so earnestly supported by many of the best people in the country was worthy of encouragement; and in his Fourth of July address in Park Street Church, Boston, in 1829, he commended it in a few words which showed clearly enough that he did not regard it as a remedy for slavery. The friends of Colonization indeed were dissatisfied with his address, both for its uncompromising denunciations of slavery and its lack of zeal in their favorite enterprise. Having consecrated his life to the work of emancipation, he naturally sought the acquaintance and sympathy of the free colored people, among whom he was glad to find some men of intelligence, good judgment and high moral worth. He was astonished to find that, without exception, they regarded the Colonization Society with feelings of strong aversion and abhorrence. They held it to be a cunning device of Southern men to avert some of the dangers that threatened the existence of slavery, and regarded as an affront to themselves the intimation that they were something less than citizens of the United States, and must consent to be deported to barbarous Africa in order to enjoy their rights. Mr. Garrison was at first inclined to remonstrate with them as the victims of a mistaken prejudice, but he soon found that they had studied the question, while he was ignorant of its bearings and consequences. They had read the reports of the Colonization Society and the speeches of its Southern as well as its Northern champions, and knew that the scheme rested upon the hateful spirit of caste as its chief corner-stone. Mr. Garrison, finding himself worsted in the argument by his colored friends, resolved to investigate the subject for himself. He procured the annual reports of the American Colonization Society, together with files of its organ, "The African Repository," and copies of numerous pamphlets, official or friendly, and set himself to the task of examining them. He found that his colored friends had not in any respect misrepresented or misunderstood the society — that the case was even worse than they had represented it. In "The Genius of Universal Emancipation" he reviewed some of Henry Clay's Colonization speeches and writings, and it is creditable to the latter that this did not hinder him from entertaining, cordially and promptly, Mr. Whittier's proposition that he should pay the fine of his critic and release him from the Baltimore jail.

On returning to New England, after his imprisonment, he found that every little rill of honest sympathy for the negro, whether bond or free, had been made tributary to the Colonization scheme; the agents of which at the North presented it as the only practicable remedy for slavery, while they denounced immediate emancipation as the wildest fanaticism. The good people of the North, in their blind credulity, had given the Colonization Society a place in their sympathies side by side with the Bible, missionary and tract societies, and flattered themselves that in supporting it they were doing all that was practicable for the abolition of slavery. It was easy to persuade them that every attack upon this society and its scheme was aimed at the whole family of benevolent and charitable associations which had become entrenched in the affection and confidence of the churches as the agencies appointed of God for the conversion of the world. Behind this society as a rampart the apologists for slavery entrenched themselves, hurling the deadliest missiles at the heads of the Abolitionists. In these circumstances Mr. Garrison was inexorably compelled to justify his impeachment of the Colonization scheme, to tear the mask from its brow and show it up in its true colors, in the light of its own official documents. Having enlarged "The Liberator" at the beginning of the year 1832, and finding himself supported and cheered by an organized society, he addressed himself to this task with a courage that no opposition could subdue, and performed it with a thoroughness that made any further demonstration unnecessary. The result of his labors was seen in a bulky pamphlet, that came from the press in the spring, entitled "Thoughts on African Colonization; or, an Impartial Exhibition of the Doctrines, Principles and Purposes of the American Colonization Society; together with the Resolutions, Addresses and Remonstrances of the Free People of Color." As a compilation of facts and authorities it was unanswerable and overwhelming. It condemned the Colonization Society out of its own mouth, and by a weight of evidence that was irresistible. There was just enough of comment to elucidate the testimony from official sources and bring it within the comprehension of the simplest reader. His indictment contained ten averments, viz. : 1. The American Colonization Society is pledged not to oppose the system of slavery; 2. It apologizes for slavery and slaveholders; 3. It recognizes slaves as property; 4. It increases the value of slaves; 5. It is the enemy of immediate abolition; 6. It is nourished by fear and selfishness; 7. It aims at the utter expulsion of the blacks; 8. It is the disparager of the free blacks; 9. It denies the possibility of elevating the blacks in this country; 10. It deceives and misleads the Nation. Each of these averments was supported by pages of citations from the annual reports of the society, from the pages of its official organ, "The African Repository," and from the speeches of its leading champions in all parts of the country. It was impossible to set this evidence aside, and equally so to resist the conclusions drawn therefrom. The work could not be, and therefore was not answered. There were nibblings, carpings and casuistical perversions, but nothing that deserved or even claimed the character of a reply. It did not indeed kill the Colonization Society, which was founded upon caste and drew the breath of life from the fetid atmosphere of slavery; but it smote it with a paralysis from which it never recovered, and sent it far to the rear of the benevolent associations to whose goodly fellowship it had unworthily aspired. Hundreds of ministers, who still hesitated to join the anti-slavery movement, thenceforth gave no further support to the Colonization scheme, feeling that they had been deceived as to its character and designs, and that the claim of some of its advocates that it was a practical remedy for slavery was either a delusion or an imposture. Only the blindest and most obstinate apologists for slavery thereafter lent it their support; but this was a numerous, wealthy and influential class, so that the treasurer's report still showed a large footing of receipts.

Just before the appearance of Mr. Garrison's "Thoughts," the American Colonization Society, taking alarm from his assaults in "The Liberator," and from the organization of the New England Anti-Slavery Society, sent to Massachusetts a Congregational clergyman, the Rev. Joshua N. Danforth, charged with the duty of defending the Colonization scheme and resisting the progress of the abolition movement. The Board of Managers of the Anti-Slavery Society promptly challenged him to a public discussion with its president, and took upon itself the responsibility of providing a hall for the purpose. But Mr. Danforth was too discreet to expose himself to the fire of our Quaker artillery. For four evenings the hall was kept open, but only a squad of irresponsible advocates of Colonization entered the lists. On one occasion, however, he did venture to attend a lecture of Mr. Buffum's, at Northampton, and, in response to the latter's courteous invitation, he made a speech sneering at Mr. Garrison as one for whose head a reward had been offered by a Southern Legislature, at Mr. Buffum as "nothing but a hatter," and at the officers of the Anti-Slavery Society generally as too insignificant for notice. The good Quaker reminded the vain clergyman that this was not the first instance in which God had chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty; that there was a story in an old-fashioned book of twelve poor, illiterate fishermen taking the lead in an enterprise upon which the Orthodox Scribes, Pharisees and priests contemptuously frowned. He reminded him also that if the Abolitionists were disposed to rest the merits of their cause upon the reputation of its champions, they might point with pride to the names of Brougham, Clarkson, Wilberforce, Buxton, Cropper, Allen, O'Connell, and a score of others hardly less eminent. Mr. Danforth had sneered at him (Mr. Buffum) as "a hatter," but he had read in the old-fashioned book above referred to of one who was despised and rejected of men, hissed at, spit upon and called the son of a carpenter, but who yet was the Son of God and the Saviour of the world. Paul was a tent-maker, Franklin a printer, Roger Sherman a shoemaker, and John Bunyan a tinker; but each of these men had done a work in the world as important, perhaps, as that of any agent of the Colonization Society. But Mr. Danforth persisted in thinking it a very clever device on his part to contrast the names of the statesmen and divines who indorsed the Colonization Society with those of "the nobodies who led the movement for immediate abolition." However weak his arguments might be, this was sure to bring down the house, when there was no opportunity for reply!

The scheme of Colonization was urged, professedly, in the interest and for the benefit of the free colored people, but strangely enough, they were never consulted, nor were their opinions and feelings treated with the least respect. Indeed, the champions of the scheme no more thought of consulting their so-called beneficiaries than Mr. Bergh thinks of consulting the horses, dogs and cats which he is trying to protect from the cruelty of man. The utterance of an unfavorable opinion on their part was held to be an impertinence. What right had "niggers" to question the schemes of their benefactors, or to set up their opinions in opposition to those of the noble white men who proposed to send them from a civilized to a barbarous land?

"Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs but to" go "and die!"

From the first organization of the society, in 1816, they cried out against the scheme as a piece of heartless injustice and cruelty; but their protest was treated with contempt, and the society went on in its crusade against them, treating them as outcasts and pariahs, "a greater nuisance than the slaves themselves," and "scarcely reached in their debasement by the heavenly light." (Vide "The African Repository.") Is it any wonder that the people thus proscribed and trodden down took heart of grace from the appearance in the field of a champion who recognized their complete humanity and their right to a hearing upon the question whether or not they deserved to be expatriated from their native land? True, the Colonization Society proposed to send them away "with their own consent;" but what a mockery that was when this "consent" was to be extorted by denouncing them as nuisances, unfit to live in the land of their birth, and by visiting them with every form of proscription, political and social, that could be devised by the spirit of caste! Mr. Garrison for the first time gave these down-trodden people a hearing before the American people. He collected their protests from the different parts of the country—from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, Hartford, Providence, and from wherever else any considerable body of the class resided—and allowed them to speak in their own language; and verily, if his work had contained nothing else, this ought to have sufficed to settle the question.

Mr. Garrison, at every step in the controversy, was careful, as far as possible, not to impeach the motives of the good men who had been deluded by the spurious pretences of the Colonization Society, and not less so to make his appeal to the Christian sentiment of the country. In one place he says: "I address myself to high-minded and honorable men, whose heads and hearts are susceptible to sound logic. I appeal to those who have been redeemed from the bondage of sin by the precious blood of Christ, and with whom I hope to unite in a better world in ascribing glory and honor and praise to the Great Deliverer. If I can succeed in gaining their attention, I feel sure of convincing their understanding and securing their support." The work throughout is pervaded by a Christian spirit, and shows that its author was inspired by a faith in God such as has been rarely witnessed among men. Here is a prophetic passage that illustrates this:—

“It is the purpose of God, I am fully persuaded, to humble the pride of the American people by rendering the expulsion of our colored countrymen utterly impracticable, and the necessity for their admission to equal rights imperative. As neither mountains of prejudice, nor the massive shackles of law and of public opinion, have been able to keep them down to a level with the slaves, I confidently anticipate their exaltation among ourselves. Through the vista of time—a short distance only—I see them here, not in Africa, not bowed to the earth or derided and persecuted as at present, not with a downcast air or an irresolute step, but standing erect as men destined heavenward, unembarrassed, untrammelled, with none to molest or make them afraid.”

If the man, who, in the thick darkness that enveloped this nation forty-seven years ago, was able to utter this prophecy, was not taught of God, from what other source did the heavenly light stream into his soul? And if the churches of America had received his message and followed that light, would they not now find their record stained by fewer blots, at sight of which they are constrained to blush?

The Abolitionists, from the very beginning, recognized the duty of devising some means for the education of colored youth. The schools, academies, universities and colleges of the land were, with hardly an exception, rigidly closed against pupils of African descent, and there was only too much reason to fear that many children of this class would grow up in ignorance, vice and crime, unless some sort of educational institutions were provided for their immediate benefit. Mr. Garrison's attention was called to this subject while he was in Baltimore, and it was a frequent topic of conversation between himself and some of the most intelligent colored citizens of that place. When he visited New Haven after his release from the Baltimore jail, the Rev. Simeon S. Jocelyn, whose death at the ripe age of eighty years occurred only a short time since, was the white pastor of a colored people's church in that city. Mr. Garrison naturally sought his acquaintance, and was happy to find in him a man after his own heart, devoted to the welfare of the colored people, and ready to co-operate in any feasible plan for their improvement. He had no faith in the Colonization scheme, and was ready to espouse the doctrine of immediate emancipation the moment it was fairly presented to his mind. So far as I know, he was the first white man to conceive the idea of founding in this country a college for negroes, and for what he did and suffered in this cause, as well as for his anti-slavery labors generally, he deserves honorable mention in these sketches. Mr. Arthur Tappan, to whom Mr. Garrison was indebted for his release from prison, was also deeply interested in the proposed college, and offered to be one of ten persons to contribute $1,000 each toward the object. To insure the success of the enterprise, it was deemed important that the colored people themselves should co-operate therein; and, as they were to hold a National Convention in Philadelphia in June, 1831, Mr. Garrison, Mr. Jocelyn and Mr. Tappan agreed to meet there for the purpose of laying the subject before them. They were very cordially received, and by invitation addressed the convention. Mr. Jocelyn, in his enthusiasm, had concluded that New Haven was the best place for the college, and was full of hope that the enterprise would command the cordial and earnest support of the people of that city and of the trustees and faculty of Yale. He had even selected a site for the college buildings — "the most beautiful spot," says Mr. Garrison, "I have ever seen. No other part of New Haven compares with it." They proposed, in their wisdom, that the institution should not be identified in any way with the new movement for the abolition of slavery, but stand upon its own merits and make its appeal to intelligent, upright and humane men of every class, party and sect. The idea was that even those who were not prepared to promote a scheme for the immediate emancipation of the slaves would yet readily unite in an effort to improve the character and condition of colored people already free.

The convention embraced some men of more than ordinary intelligence and worth — men who in a white convention would have won distinction for ability, thoughtfulness and dignity. By these the proposal to found a college was enthusiastically received, and, after a day spent in debate, the project was unanimously approved, and the Rev. Samuel E. Cornish, a colored Presbyterian, of New York, was appointed an agent for the collection of funds. The matter was confided to a committee, consisting of the venerable James Forten, Joseph Cassey, Robert Douglass, Robert Purvis and Frederick A. Hinton, all of Philadelphia, and men of recognized mark and influence among the people of their class. The plan was for the colored people themselves to raise $10,000, and to collect an equal sum from white people. It was proposed to call the institution "A Collegiate School on the Manual Labor Plan," and the funds to be collected were to be deposited in the United States Bank, to the credit of Arthur Tappan. The committee obtained a rather cold endorsement of the plan by the venerable Bishop White, and his assistant, Bishop H. U. Onderdonk. It was also commended by the Rev. G. T. Bedell, afterward Bishop of Ohio, and by the Rev. Drs. Thomas McAuley and Ezra Stiles Ely, men of mark in the Presbyterian church.

Against a scheme so noble in its purpose, and so carefully and prudently devised, what could be said? Was it not rational to expect that Christians of every denomination, and the friends of education especially, would give it a cordial support? Who could have anticipated that the people of New England, proud as they were of their schools, academies and colleges, would take offence at this effort to uplift an unfortunate and down-trodden class of American citizens? Who could have deemed it possible that churches calling themselves Christian, and that were full of zeal to establish schools in heathen nations, would treat with contempt, indifference or hostility this effort to provide the means of education for a large number of children growing up in ignorance in their very midst? Yet it was even so. If the proposal had been to establish an institution for the propagation of leprosy, small-pox or yellow fever, it could hardly have been scouted with a fiercer indignation or resisted with a more vehement energy. On every side was heard the exclamation, "We don't want any negro colleges in America; send them back to their own country." It was not alone in places of low resort or among the ignorant and degraded classes of society that this hateful spirit of caste prevailed; it broke out like a leprosy in "good society," and even in the Christian churches. The Richmond "Religious Telegraph," edited by the Rev. A. Converse, a recreant son of New England, and a graduate of Dartmouth College, published, with editorial commendation, an argument to justify the keeping of the slaves in ignorance, on the ground that it would be "highly inexpedient, and even dangerous to the peace of the community, to teach them to read and write"; while in regard to the free people of color, the editor declared in so many words: "If they were taught to read it might be an inducement to them to remain in the country. We would offer them no such inducement." When I add that the article in which these views were urged was copied sympathetically, without a word of comment or protest, in "The Boston Recorder," the expositor of New England orthodoxy, and when it is remembered that this was the very spirit of colonization, by which the Northern churches had become so extensively infected, no one at this day need wonder at the hostility evoked by the proposal to found a collegiate school for the instruction of negro children. The only wonder is that Mr. Garrison and his associates, after the exhibitions they had witnessed of the spirit of caste, were so simple as to imagine that their plan was feasible. But they were very slow to be convinced that the Christianity of the North had become so debased. They said, "It is only a mistake, a delusion, that will quickly pass away, as the vapors of the night are dispelled by the rising sun." It is the only point in respect to which their prescience was seriously at fault. But how could they readily suspect that the churches under whose influence they had been trained, and which they had been taught to revere as the representatives of Christ and his religion, had entered into a moral eclipse so deep and dark? They would not believe it, and they did not until they were compelled; and when at length the whole sad truth dawned upon their unwilling minds, they surrendered their faith in the churches while adhering more firmly than before to their faith in Christianity and its Divine Founder.

In New Haven there was a high effervescence of hostility to the proposed college. A city meeting, duly warned, was held (September 10, 1831), the Mayor, the Hon. Denis Kimberly, in the chair. Distinguished citizens, the Hon. Judge Daggett at their head, made indignant speeches, and the meeting resolved, by a vote of 700 to 4, "That the founding of colleges for educating colored people is an unwarrantable and dangerous interference with the internal concerns of other States, and ought to be discouraged"; that "the establishment in New Haven" of such a college "is incompatible with the prosperity if not the existence of the present institutions of learning, and will be destructive of the best interests of the city"; and that "the Mayor, Aldermen, Common Council and Freemen" will "resist the establishment of the proposed college in this place by every lawful means." Mr. Jocelyn, the white pastor of the colored church, appears to have been the only clergyman in the city who had the courage to protest against this frenzied exhibition of colorphobia. The honored faculty of Yale assented by its silence to this imputation put upon its character by the meeting. Dr. Bacon, the popular pastor of the Centre Church, a leading Colonizationist, and a powerful writer and platform speaker, did not find his voice on this occasion, but, like his elders, bent before the storm. When the whole tide of Colonization influence was running with Niagara force against the proposed college, it would have been an act of sublime heroism on his part if he had lifted his voice in its defence, as, twenty years later, he dared to protest against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Of the public opinion that could silence a man of such courage little need be said.

In the face of such opposition the plan of the proposed college seems to have been abandoned as impracticable. A year later Arnold Buffum, president of the New England Anti-Slavery Society, made an effort to establish a colored seminary, but the anti-slavery excitement increased so rapidly as to absorb the time and means of the Abolitionists, and he was compelled to abandon the scheme.

But another and still darker tale remains to be told. In 1832, Prudence Crandall, a Quaker young woman of high character, established in Canterbury, Windham County, Conn., a school for young ladies. Now there was in that town a respectable colored farmer named Harris, who had a daughter, a bright girl of seventeen, who, having passed creditably through one of the district schools, desired to qualify herself to be a teacher of colored children. She was a girl of pleasing appearance and manners, a member of the Congregational church, and of a hue not darker than that of some persons who pass for white. Miss Crandall, good

Quaker that she was, admitted this girl to her school. The pupils, some of whom had been associated with her in the district school, made no objection; but some of the parents were offended, and demanded the removal of the dark-skinned pupil. Miss Crandall made a strong appeal in behalf of the girl, and did her best to overcome the prejudices of the objectors, but in vain. After reflection she came to the conclusion, from a sense of duty, to open her school to other girls of a dark complexion. The announcement of her purpose threw the whole town into a ferment. A town-meeting was held in the Congregational Church, and so fierce was the excitement that the Rev. Samuel J. May and Mr. Arnold Buffum, the Quaker President of the New England Anti-Slavery Society, who had been deputed by Miss Crandall to speak for her, were denied a hearing. She had authorized these gentlemen to say that she would remove the school if her opponents would take her house off her hands on fair terms. Resolutions of the most denunciatory character were offered and supported by leading citizens and unanimously adopted. The leader in these proceedings was Andrew T. Judson, Esq., a lawyer of more than local reputation, a Democratic politician, much talked of as likely to be chosen Governor of the State. He was subsequently appointed Judge of the United States District Court. He avowed himself a Colonizationist, and said he was determined that no "nigger" school should be set up anywhere in Connecticut. The colored people were an inferior race; they could never rise from their menial condition in this country, and they ought not to be permitted to if they could. Africa was the place for them, and thither they should be sent.

But Miss Crandall, unmoved by these manifestations of hostility, received into her school fifteen or twenty colored girls from Philadelphia, New York, Providence and Boston. Then began a series of persecutions of the most inhuman character. The storekeepers of Canterbury refused to sell her anything, and she was compelled to send to the neighboring villages for household supplies. She and her pupils were insulted whenever they appeared in the streets. The doors and door-steps of her house were besmeared, and her well was filled with the most odious filth. Had it not been for the help afforded her by her father and another Quaker friend, who lived in the town, she would have found it impossible to obtain water or food. The pupils were excluded from the privileges of public worship by the officers of the Congregational church! An attempt was made to drive them away by the revival of an obsolete vagrant law, which provided that the selectmen of any town might warn any person, not an inhabitant of the State, to depart forthwith, and if the warning should be disregarded and the prescribed fine not be paid, then, after the lapse of ten days, the person might be whipped on the naked body not exceeding ten stripes! A warrant, under this law, was actually served upon one of the pupils from Providence, but when it was seen that she was not frightened, the proceeding was abandoned. Moreover, the persecutors were baffled by the Rev. Mr. May, of the neighboring town of Brooklyn, who gave the treasurer of Canterbury a bond in the sum of $10,000, signed by responsible gentlemen, to save the town from the vagrancy of any of the pupils. Then the persecutors procured the enactment of a law subjecting to fine and imprisonment any person who should set up anywhere in Connecticut a school for the instruction of colored pupils not residents of the State. When the news arrived in Canterbury of the passage of this infamous and unconstitutional law, the bells were rung, a cannon was fired, and the people gave themselves up to various demonstrations of joy. Miss Crandall was arraigned, bound over for trial, and thrust into jail, where she occupied a cell just vacated by a murderer. Such was the excitement that the local press dared not publish a line from Miss Crandall or any of her friends. In this emergency, Mr. Arthur Tappan, the noble New York merchant who had opened Garrison's prison door, furnished the Rev. Mr. May with funds to enable him to establish a newspaper, "The Unionist," and made himself responsible for whatever sum might be required to employ counsel for the defence for Miss Crandall. The story of the legal contest that ensued is too long to be told here. It was brought to an end by a technical error in the proceedings, so that no decision upon the merits was ever reached. The school, however, was finally broken up by violence. Miss Crandall's house was set on fire in the night, and it was saved from destruction only because the sill under which the combustibles were applied was so rotten that it would not burn quickly. A few nights after this—to wit, on the 9th of September, 1834—the house was assaulted at midnight by a mob armed with heavy clubs and iron bars; five window-sashes were demolished, and ninety panes of glass broken in pieces. For these outrages in this Christian town there was no redress, and the school was abandoned.

Two young men, brothers, who were afterwards widely and honorably known in connection with the anti-slavery cause, were first brought to public notice during the Canterbury conflict. I allude to Charles C. and William H. Burleigh. The former was the chosen editor of "The Unionist," the paper established by Mr. May for the defence of Miss Crandall. He had just fitted himself for the bar, and gave promise of eminence in his chosen profession. As an editor he did a good work, and so also did his brother as his assistant. Both of them afterwards entered the anti-slavery field as lecturers. Both were powerful and eloquent champions of the cause. William was for some time editor of an anti-slavery paper in Pittsburgh. He was a poet of no mean reputation. In the division of 1840, he joined the Liberty party; but Charles continued his association with Mr. Garrison to the close of the conflict. Few men did more than the latter, by public speech, to form the public opinion which demanded the overthrow of slavery. He was as remarkable for his clear-sightedness and devotion as for his eloquence.

If anybody wishes to know how it happens that Windham County, by her large Republican majority, has often saved the State of Connecticut from falling into the hands of the Copperhead Democracy, he may find the explanation in the facts above related, and in the discussions that ensued. The Abolitionism of that county was of the most thorough sort, receiving its impress and its impetus from men in full sympathy with Mr. Garrison. In that county the Rev. Samuel J. May, of blessed memory, did his earliest and best work, supported by the Bensons, the Burleighs, and others of a no less sterling character. There was in the beginning a Garrisonian grip and vim in the anti-slavery sentiment of the county that was never lost, and that no political arts could overcome. In other parts of the State abolitionism was less intelligent and less thorough, and subject to unfortunate dilutions from men of expediency, whose every word against slavery was supplemented by two in opposition to "the extravagances of Garrison." Milk and water is not the diet that makes reform sinewy and powerful. If Connecticut anti-slavery, like that of Massachusetts, had been fed from the table of "The Liberator," that State, at no time within the last twenty-five years, would have been in danger of falling into the hands of the pro-slavery Democracy. Every county in it would have been as thoroughly abolitionized as Windham.

VIII.

Mr. Garrison goes to England—His Arrival Opportune—British Emancipation—Exposure of the Colonization Scheme—Protest of Wilberforce and Others—Death of Wilberforce—Mr. Garrison Speaks in Exeter Hall—Writes to the London "Patriot"—Taken for a Negro by Buxton—George Thompson—His Mission to America and its Results—He Returns to England—Preparing to Form a National Society—Mrs. Child's Appeal—Phelps's Lectures on Slavery—Western Reserve College—President Storrs and Professors Green and Wright—Death of President Storrs—Mob in New York.

SOON after the formation of the New England Anti-Slavery Society it became known to its managers that the American Colonization Society had sent an agent to England, who, under the false pretence that the Society favored or was calculated to promote the abolition of American slavery, was collecting considerable sums of money for its treasury from the too credulous Abolitionists of that country. To counteract the efforts of this agent, and to establish co-operative relations between British and American Abolitionists, Mr. Garrison, in the spring of 1833, was commissioned to visit England. It was not without difficulty that the funds to defray the expenses of this mission were obtained. The resources of the new society were hardly adequate to such an enterprise, but by persevering effort the object was achieved, and Mr. Garrison took his departure for the Old World with high hopes, followed by the prayers and sympathies of his devoted associates, and by the execrations of the pro-slavery party. He arrived in England at an opportune moment. The anti-slavery struggle in that country was approaching its consummation. The leaders of the cause, from all parts of the United Kingdom, were holding a conference in London to prepare for their anticipated triumph in the passage of the Act of Emancipation. Mr. Garrison on presenting his credentials was received with open arms and invited to an honorary seat in a conference embracing such men as Clarkson, Wilberforce, Brougham, Macaulay, Buxton and O'Connell. He was then but twenty-eight years of age, but his modest bearing, combined with his grave earnestness and sound judgment, won the confidence of these eminent men, who were cheered by the hope that America, under the influence of so wise a leader, would be speedily redeemed from the curse of slavery. Every desired facility was offered him for fulfilling the objects of his mission. He put his work, "Thoughts on African Colonization," into the hands of eminent men, some of whom had been misled by the agent of the Colonization Society, and in public and private diligently explained the origin, purpose and spirit of the Colonization scheme, citing official documents in proof of his charges against it. The anti-slavery feeling of Great Britain was then at a white heat, and the Abolitionists were indignant in view of the attempt to dupe them into the support of a society controlled by slaveholders in the interest of slavery. The agent of the Colonization scheme found his position far from enviable; his occupation was soon gone, and not long afterward he returned to the United States. Mr. Garrison brought home with him a "Protest" against the Colonization scheme, signed by Wilberforce, Macaulay, Buxton, O'Connell, and others of scarcely less weight, in which they declared that its claims to anti-slavery support were "wholly groundless," and expressed their "deliberate judgment and conviction" that its professions were "delusive," its "real effects of the most dangerous nature." This protest, as well it might, had great weight with all sincere opponents of slavery in America, while it enraged the Colonizationists, who charged Mr. Garrison with deceiving the signers, though he had done no more than to call their attention to the utterances of the prominent advocates of the scheme. Thomas Clarkson, shortly before his death, addressed a letter to Mr. Garrison, in which he also repudiated the Colonization scheme in very earnest language.

Mr. Garrison's intercourse with the Abolitionists of Great Britain, and his studies of the work in which they were engaged, filled him with new hope and courage, and taught him some valuable lessons as to the ways and means of abolishing slavery at home. His faith in the potency of immediate emancipation as a working principle was confirmed by the experience of his British friends, and he saw more clearly than ever the danger and folly of compromises, and the delusive character of all partial and half-way measures. It was while he was in England that Wilberforce died, and it was his sad privilege to participate in the obsequies of that great and good man, and to follow his remains to Westminster Abbey. Whether the Act of West India Emancipation was passed before or after his return I am not sure; but the measure was under discussion in Parliament while he was there, and he had the satisfaction of listening to the eloquence of some of its noblest champions in public meetings, if not in that body. The exhilarating effect of such scenes upon the mind of a young American, consecrated to the work of emancipation in his own country, may be more easily imagined than described.

Mr. Garrison had a hearing in Exeter Hall, where he made a powerful speech, denouncing American slavery in the severest terms, and sweeping away with an invincible logic the apologies offered in its behalf. He spoke of the inconsistency and guilt of his own country in the strongest terms, giving great offence to some Americans then in England. He also wrote a letter, which was printed in the London "Patriot," in which he handled the subject with the same plainness of speech. "I know," he said, "that there is much declamation about the sacredness of the compact which was formed between the free and the slave States in the adoption of the National Constitution. A sacred compact, forsooth! I pronounce it the most bloody and Heaven-daring arrangement ever made by men for the continuance and protection of the most atrocious villainy ever exhibited on earth. Yes, I recognize the compact, but with feelings of shame and indignation; and it will be held in everlasting infamy by the friends of humanity and justice throughout the world. Who or what were the framers of the American government, that they should dare confirm and authorize such high-handed villainy — such a flagrant robbery of the inalienable rights of man — such a glaring violation of all the precepts and injunctions of the gospel — such a savage war upon a sixth part of the whole population? It was not valid then — it is not valid now. Still they persist in maintaining it; and still do their successors, the people of New England and of the twelve free States, persist in maintaining it. A sacred compact! a sacred compact! What then is wicked and ignominious?"

It is easy to say that this language is severe and even bitter; but it is not possible to deny its truth. What was it but a crime for a great nation, which had solemnly called upon the whole civilized world to bear witness to its sincerity in declaring that all men were created free and equal, to proceed to frame its government upon the condition that millions of human beings, and their descendants after them, should be slaves as long as it might please the masters to keep them in bondage; to pledge its military power to keep them from breaking their own chains, and to thrust back into the hell of bondage any slave who should presume to run away?

One incident of Mr. Garrison's first visit to England is worthy of mention here. Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, before meeting him, desiring to do him honor, invited him to breakfast. Mr. Garrison presented himself at the appointed time at Mr. Buxton's house. When his name was announced, Mr. Buxton, instead of coming forward promptly to take him by the hand, scrutinized him from head to foot, and then inquired, somewhat dubiously, "Have I the pleasure of addressing Mr. Garrison, of Boston, in the United States?" "Yes," said Mr. Garrison, "I am he; and I am here in accordance with your invitation." Lifting up both hands, Mr. Buxton exclaimed: "Why, my dear sir, I thought you were a black man, and I have consequently invited this company of ladies and gentlemen to be present to welcome Mr. Garrison, the black advocate of emancipation from the United States of America." Mr. Buxton had seen some numbers of "The Liberator," and, supposing that no white American could plead for those in bondage as Mr. Garrison did, inferred that he was a black man. Mr. Garrison used to say, that of all the compliments ever paid to him, this was the one that pleased him most, because it was a testimonial of his unqualified recognition of the humanity of the negro.

Among the British Abolitionists with whom Mr. Garrison formed a close acquaintance was Mr. George Thompson, a man but little older than himself, and who had taken a conspicuous part in the struggle for West India emancipation. He was a man of surpassing force, eloquence and wit, who had vanquished the champions of slavery in England on many a field, and led the friends of emancipation to the victory that was just then crowning the grand struggle. He was for years the only lecturing agent of the London Anti-Slavery Society, and in this capacity performed an incredible amount of labor. He was in request in all parts of the kingdom, and everywhere his lectures were attended by crowds of the most intelligent people, who were enchanted by his eloquence and deeply moved by his appeals. He was a religious man, a Methodist, and in his youth had been the humble assistant of the Rev. Richard Watson, the great Methodist theologian. The greatest men in the kingdom — Brougham, Buxton, Wilberforce, O'Connell, and scores of others that might be named — always listened to him with wonder and delight; and in the House of Lords, at the time of the passage of the Act of Emancipation, Lord Brougham said: "I rise to take the crown of this most glorious victory from every other head and place it upon George Thompson's. He has done more than any other man to achieve it."

What wonder that Mr. Garrison, after listening to the magic eloquence of this man, and hearing him commended by the greatest men in England for the purity of his character and his unselfish devotion to the cause of the oppressed, conceived the idea, now that the freedom of the slaves in the West Indies had been secured, of inviting him to come to the United States and devote his masterly powers to the work of emancipation here? How could he imagine that his fellow-countrymen would greet such a man, — a Christian, a friend and admirer of republican institutions, and a philanthropist of world-wide sympathies — with malignant hisses as a "British emissary," with "pockets full of British gold," and bent upon destroying the Union? He knew, of course, that there were prejudices here against England and Englishmen; but how could he, an American, loving his country, believe that this prejudice would degenerate into utter violence and brutality, and that such a man, inspired by a holy purpose and seeking only to aid us in breaking the fetters of our slaves, would be hunted by Americans as a wild beast is hunted, and compelled to flee from our shores to save his life? Thirty-four years afterward Mr. Garrison said: "I had nothing to offer him — no money — no reward of any kind, except that which ever comes from well-doing. I supposed he would meet with a good deal of opposition, but I did not invite him to martyrdom. I did not imagine he would be subjected to such diabolical treatment as was afterward shown to him. I only felt sure that if he could but obtain a fair hearing it would ere long be all over with slavery. I was confident that no audience would be able to withstand the power of his eloquence and the force of his arguments." But it was the knowledge of his great power that maddened the champions and apologists of slavery; and from the time that he landed in New York, in the fall of 1834, until his departure a year later, he was denounced in the press, and not infrequently in the pulpit, as an enemy of the country, an emissary of the British Government, sent hither to destroy our institutions. The Abolitionists, of course, received him with open arms, and found in him all and more than had been promised. Invitations poured in upon him from every quarter, and he was heard in Boston, Portland, Providence, Concord, N. H., and in many other places in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio. In some instances he was even admitted to pulpits on Sunday. In every place where he spoke there are to this day undying traditions of his matchless eloquence and power. In many instances, men who went to scoff, or perhaps meditating violence against him, were completely subdued and won to the cause. But all this only made the supporters of slavery the more angry, until at length his appearance in almost any place became the signal for a mob. An announcement, unauthorized and false, that he would address the Female Anti-Slavery Society of Boston, October 21, 1835, threw that city into a fearful state of excitement. He had been secreted by his friends some time before, and had no intention of being present at the meeting in question. On the morning of the day, October 21, the streets of the city were placarded with the announcement that "that infamous foreign scoundrel, Thompson," would speak in the afternoon at No. 46 Washington Street, and "the friends of the Union" were reminded that there would be "a fair opportunity to snake him out." It was announced that "a purse of one hundred dollars" would "reward the individual" who should "first lay violent hands on Thompson, so that he may be brought to the tar-kettle before dark." This was the incitement to that famous Boston mob of "gentlemen of property and standing," of which an account will be given in another place. A month later Mr. Thompson embarked privately in a small English brig bound from Boston to St. Johns, from which port he sailed for England.

I have told the story of Mr. Thompson's first visit to this country a little out of the chronological order, because it seemed naturally to connect itself with the account of Mr. Garrison's first visit to England, and having gone thus far, I may as well complete here what I have to say of this distinguished champion of the anti-slavery cause. After his return to England he took an active part in the movement for the abolition of the wretched apprenticeship system in the West Indies, and was engaged with Cobden and Bright in the great Corn law agitation which revolutionized the commercial policy of Great Britain. He was also enlisted in the defence of the people of India against the tyrannous practices of the East India Company, and in pursuit of that object passed several years in the East, returning home in broken health. He was elected to Parliament from the Tower Hamlets of London, but does not seem to have found the situation altogether congenial to his tastes and habits. In 1850, during the Fugitive Slave law excitement, he came to this country again, and remained, I think, nearly a year. Fifteen years had not sufficed wholly to remove the prejudices awakened by his first visit, but his life was no longer in danger. He was received with high honors in many places, and cheered by the mighty change wrought in public sentiment since the time when he was constrained to flee in secret from our shores. He was still a powerful speaker, and was heard in many places with delight. When the slaveholders' rebellion broke out in 1861, he devoted himself to the championship of the Northern cause among his countrymen. It was by his labors and those of a few kindred spirits that the laboring people as well as the middle class of the English population were kept informed of the nature and progress of our war, and a public opinion developed there that deterred the British Government from openly espousing the rebel cause. His labors in this direction were highly appreciated by President Lincoln and Secretary Stanton, and when, before the end of the war, he came again to the United States, the hall of the House of Representatives was opened for his reception, and thronged by such an assembly of people from the loyal States as is rarely seen within those walls. The Vice-President of the the United States was in the chair, and President Lincoln, with most of the members of his cabinet, was present. On this occasion, though in feeble health and suffering from some of the infirmities of age, he spoke with not a little of his old fire, calling forth the universal applause of his great audience. The President invited him to the Executive Mansion, and showed him every mark of respect. In many of the cities and towns of the country he was welcomed and honored with equal heartiness and enthusiasm. By invitation of the Secretary of War, he and Mr. Garrison accompanied Major Anderson and his party, on board of the "Arago," in April, 1865, to see the star-spangled banner once more unfurled on the walls of Sumter. He marched in the procession, more than a mile long, extemporized by the Freedmen, which escorted the visitors from the North through the principal streets of Charleston, singing the while, —

"John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave, But his soul is marching on" — and giving cheer after cheer for Abraham Lincoln and others of their Northern friends. Thus did America, "redeemed, regenerated and disenthralled" from the execrable system of slavery, atone in part for the insults and persecutions inflicted at an early day by so many of her deluded citizens upon this noble champion of universal liberty.

Mr. Thompson was a genuine lover of republican institutions, and had the courage to avow that love under the shadow of the British throne, and in the presence of the British aristocracy. America never found in any foreign land a truer or more disinterested friend. The motives of Lafayette and Steuben and Kosciusko, in coming over the Atlantic to help us in our Revolutionary struggle, were not purer than those of Mr. Thompson in coming hither to take part in the movement for the overthrow of the system of slavery, and his name deserves to be handed down to posterity on both sides of the Atlantic, among those of the noblest benefactors of mankind. The attachment between him and Mr. Garrison was as warm as that between David and Jonathan. Their souls were knit together by common purposes, hopes and aspirations, and they were not far divided in their death, Mr.

Thompson's departure occurring only a few months before that of his devoted friend.

Before Mr. Garrison's departure for England, and during his absence, there was much serious talk among Abolitionists about organizing a National Anti-Slavery Society. The need of such an association was seriously felt, and the only question was whether the time for its organization had come. Already a considerable number of local auxiliaries to the New England Anti-Slavery Society had been formed, and the cause was gaining a strong foothold in many places. The circulation of "The Liberator" was extending, and its power was felt in many quarters. A considerable number of clergymen of different denominations had espoused the cause and opened their pulpits to anti-slavery lectures, while others were anxiously considering the subject. There was, moreover, a most auspicious beginning of an anti-slavery literature. Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, "than whom," said "The North American Review" of the period, "few female writers, if any, have done more or better things for our literature, in its lighter or graver departments," published in the summer of 1833 a most valuable book, creditable alike to her literary skill and her womanly courage. She was the most popular female writer in the country — popular at the South as well as at the North; and she not only made a sacrifice of her popularity, but exposed herself to an overwhelming tide of obloquy and abuse by lending her powerful pen to the cause of the slave. Nothing could have been more pertinent or timely, and, I may add, more convincing, than her "Appeal in Favor of that Class of Americans called Africans." It showed up the slave-system in the light of the laws framed for its regulation; cited multitudes of authentic facts showing that the system was of necessity barbarous and cruel; proved by the laws of human nature and the testimony of experience the perfect safety of immediate emancipation; vindicated the humanity of the negro, and exposed the character and designs of the Colonization Society. The book was received with joy by the Abolitionists, with rage by their opponents. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" came long after this, and only when the way had been prepared for it by toils and sacrifices of which the people of this generation know very little. The "Appeal," though sneered at and denounced in high quarters, was widely read, and converts were multiplied by its influence. And having introduced the name of this excellent woman, I will add that from that early day to the end of the conflict her pen was always at the service of the cause. Her anti-slavery writings, too various to be enumerated here, were of the highest value, and "The National Anti-Slavery Standard," under her editorship, exerted a wide and powerful influence. It was her privilege to witness the final triumph of the cause she served so faithfully; and now, in a green old age, her mental powers are unimpaired, her pen still employed in the service of mankind.

Another book of equal power and value with Mrs. Child's "Appeal" was published before the end of the year (1833). I allude to "Lectures on Slavery and its Remedy," by the Rev. Amos A. Phelps, pastor of the Pine Street Congregational Church, Boston. The author, a young man of fine ability and promise, a graduate of Yale (both College and Theological Seminary), was full of zeal in the cause. While his book was passing through the press, it occurred to him that it would be a good thing to publish with it a declaration of anti-slavery sentiment, signed by a number of clergymen of different denominations. He accordingly drew up such a declaration and sent it out for signatures among his clerical brethren. One hundred and twenty-four names were returned from Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Ohio, and their appearance in the book encouraged the Abolitionists to hope that the churches would soon espouse the cause in a body. The substance of the declaration was: "1. That colonization is not an adequate remedy for slavery, and must therefore be abandoned for something that is; and 2. That the scheme of immediate emancipation is such a remedy, and is therefore to be adopted and urged." In looking over the list of signers I find a few eminent names, among them those of the late George Shepard, of Bangor; David Thurston, of Winthrop; Professor William Smyth, of Bowdoin College; Jacob Ide, of Medway, Mass. (still living at well-nigh a hundred years of age); D. C. Lansing, of Utica; Beriah Green, of the Oneida Institute; Joshua Leavitt, editor of "The New York Evangelist"; Asa Mahan, of Cincinnati (afterward President of Oberlin); Professor John Morgan, of Lane Theological Seminary; Charles B. Storrs, President of the Western Reserve College, and the sainted Samuel J. May. I may also include the name of the late Rev. Dr. Joel Parker, who afterwards settled in New Orleans and made shipwreck of his anti-slavery faith. These and some others were men of considerable influence at that day, but the signers, for the most part, were undistinguished. "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble," had accepted the new gospel of freedom. The cause had a charm for ingenuous, uncalculating young men, while the timid, the ambitious and the self-seeking naturally stood aloof. Pastors of wealthy churches in the cities and larger towns, men who aspired to leadership in their respective denominations, as a general rule, resisted the movement with all the weapons at their command.

Another event that greatly encouraged the Abolitionists was the favor shown to their cause by the president and several of the professors of the Western Reserve College at Hudson, Ohio. "The Liberator" and Garrison's "Thoughts on Colonization" had found their way to this institution, where they exerted an instant and powerful influence. The president and at least two of the professors espoused the cause with their whole hearts, and not only discussed the subject themselves, but invited discussion on the part of the students. The president was the Rev. Charles B. Storrs, a gifted younger brother of the late Richard S. Storrs, D.D., of Braintree; Mass. No other man of his age in the United States was in higher repute as an eloquent preacher and a man of fearless devotion to every principle of truth and righteousness than he. "The fear of man that bringeth a snare" had no place in his noble nature. He loved liberty — liberty for all men — with his whole heart, and could see no reason why a black man more than a white one should be reduced to slavery. He felt himself bound as a Christian to testify against every form of despotism, and to "remember them that were in bonds as bound with them." Convinced of the iniquity and danger of American slavery, he wrote and preached against it with an earnestness and eloquence that stirred the hearts of all who listened. Professor Beriah Green, a man of kindred spirit and a no less powerful preacher, was another convert to the cause; and so also was Professor Elizur Wright, a layman, who wielded a pen as keen as a Damascus blade. These men, by their discussion of the slavery question, produced a profound excitement, not only in the college, but all over Northern Ohio. The trustees were alarmed, thinking if the excitement continued the college would be ruined. A controversy ensued, which resulted in the resignation of these three men — a blow to the college from which it did not recover for years. President Storrs soon afterward fell a victim to consumption, dying at the house of his brother in Braintree. His last effort to guide a pen was in the attempt to append his name to the declaration of sentiment printed with the lectures of Mr. Phelps. His paper was ruled for him, and all things prepared. He took the pen, traced all the letters of his first name, but found that one of them was transposed, laid down the pen calmly and said: "I can write no more — I've blundered here. Brother, will you write my name and give the date and place where I am? Those principles are eternal truths, and cannot be shaken. I wish to give them my testimony." One of the first of Whittier's anti-slavery poems — perhaps, with the exception of his Lines to Garrison, the very first — is his tribute to this noble man, from which I select these stanzas: —

"Thou hast fallen in thine armor,
 Thou martyr of the Lord!
 With thy last breath crying 'Onward!'
 And thy hand upon thy sword.
 The haughty heart derideth,
 And the sinful lip reviles,
 But the blessing of the perishing
 Around thy pillow smiles.

Oppression's hand may scatter
 Its nettles on thy tomb,
 And even Christian bosoms
 Deny thy memory room;
 For lying lips shall torture
 Thy mercy into crime,
 And the slanderer shall flourish
 As the bay-tree, for a time.

But, where the south wind lingers
 On Carolina's pines,
 Or, falls the careless sunbeam
 Down Georgia's golden mines;
 Where now beneath his burden
 The toiling slave is driven;
 Where now a tyrant's mockery
 Is offered unto Heaven —

Where Mammon hath its altars,
 Wet o'er with human blood,
 And pride and lust debases
 The workmanship of God —
 There shall thy praise be spoken,
 Redeemed from Falsehood's ban,
 When the fetters shall be broken,
 And the slave shall be a man!

In the evil days before us,
 And the trials yet to come,
 In the shadow of the prison
 Or the cruel martyrdom,
 We will think of thee, O brother!
 And thy sainted name shall be
 In the blessing of the captive,
 In the anthem of the free."

Beriah Green was called to the presidency of the Oneida Institute, where, as teacher and preacher for many years, he exerted a great influence, being widely known and beloved. He was equally eloquent with voice and pen. Professor Wright was called to serve the American Anti-Slavery Society, shortly afterwards formed, as Corresponding Secretary — an office that he filled with consummate ability for four or five years. The annual reports from his pen were masterly presentations of the society's principles and objects. He edited the society's publications, "The Emancipator," "Human Rights," "Anti-Slavery Record," and "Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine," making them all powerful agents for promoting the cause. At a later date he was editor of "The Massachusetts Abolitionist," and later still of a Boston daily paper, "The Chronotype."

Mr. Garrison's account of what he had seen and heard in England greatly encouraged the friends of the cause, and he was himself no less cheered when he found, on his return, that a call had been issued for a convention to meet in Philadelphia on the 4th, 5th and 6th of the ensuing December, to form a National Anti-Slavery Society. He entered into the project with all his heart. The public mind was in an exceedingly feverish condition. The enemies of the anti-slavery cause, seeing that it was rapidly gaining ground, and stung to madness by what they called the "impertinent interference" of Wilberforce and other English Abolitionists with the "domestic institutions" of the United States, began to show symptoms of a purpose to resort to violence in order to suppress the agitation. The formation of an Anti-Slavery Society in New York, which took place on the day of Garrison's landing in the city on his return from England, was made the occasion of a mob. The Abolitionists defeated their opponents by a ruse. Foreseeing that their meeting, if held at the place where it was first appointed, would be broken up, they went to the old Chatham Street Chapel, where they organized their society, and then retired through a rear door as the mob entered at the front. The disturbers encountered but one man, the noble old Quaker, Isaac T. Hopper, who, when his fellow Abolitionists retired, concluded to stay and see what the mob would do. He was found sitting in imperturbable quiet, in a meditative mood, on one of the benches, not in the least disturbed by the entrance of the mob, whom he badgered and shamed by his unfailing wit. The mob was instigated by the press, notably by James Watson Webb's "Courier and Enquirer" and Colonel Stone's "Commercial Advertiser." Not that these papers, in so many words, recommended a resort to violence, but that their inflammatory denunciations and misrepresentations of the Abolitionists were precisely adapted, if not even intended, to produce that result.

This mob occurred after the call for the National Convention was issued. If it had occurred sooner, possibly the Convention might have been delayed, and possibly it might not. The Abolitionists, though courageous, were not reckless. They did not desire to provoke violence; far from it. But they felt that their cause was just — that God was on their side ; and they were sure that, whatever of reproach, persecution or violence they might be called to endure, the cause would eventually triumph. They were resolved to act a worthy part, as men and Christians who loved their country, and who meant, by the help of God, to deliver it from the crime and curse of human bondage. And so they held their Convention.

IX.

Formation of the American Anti-Slavery Society — Character and Spirit of the Convention — The Declaration of Sentiments Drafted by Garrison — Close of the Convention — The Society Begins its Work — Headquarters in New York — The First Anniversary — The Bible Society Tested and Found Wanting — Hostility of the Press — Attitude of the Churches — Apologies for Slavery — Mobs — Judge Jay — W. I. Emancipation.

THE National Convention which met in Philadelphia Dec. 4, 1833, to form the American Anti-Slavery Society, was a very remarkable body of men, and its proceedings were of the highest interest and importance from their bearing upon the progress of the cause and the welfare of the nation. It was composed of sixty-two delegates from eleven different States. Without a single exception, I believe, they were Christian men, most of them members, and a dozen or so ministers of evangelical or Orthodox churches. Only two or three of the small denomination of Unitarians were present, but one of these, the late Samuel J. May, was a host in himself. Both branches of the Society of Friends, Orthodox and Hicksite, were represented. I was not myself a member of the Convention. Before it was called I left Boston for a visit to Ohio, under circumstances which made my attendance impossible. This to me has been a subject of life-long regret, for no public gathering during the whole anti-slavery struggle was more memorable than this. It was composed of men, most of whom had never seen each other before, but who were drawn together by convictions and purposes as high as any that ever animated the human soul. They were of one heart and one mind, their bond of union being the common love of freedom which the founders of the Republic declared to be inalienable, and which is of the very soul and substance of Christianity; a common hatred of a system which made merchandise of humanity, and a common purpose to do what they might, by the help of God, to deliver their country from such a crime and curse. They knew that they were undertaking no holiday task. They saw the black cloud that was gathering around them, and heard the mutterings of the storm that was so soon to burst upon their devoted heads. Philadelphia, then a Southern city in its sympathies, met them with angry frowns. The press teemed with misrepresentations and menaces that fell upon the Southern hot-bloods gathered in the medical schools, and upon other mobocratic elements of the population, as sparks upon tinder. The very air of the city was sulphurous, ready at any moment to burst into a devouring flame. They were officially warned to hold no evening meetings; the Mayor could only assure them protection in the daytime! This in the city of "Brotherly Love," whence issued, but fifty-seven years before, the Declaration of American Independence! In such circumstances we need not wonder that some of the delegates, at a preliminary conference, resolved, if possible, to persuade some distinguished and well-known citizen of the city, whose name might be a shield, to act as president of the Convention. Thomas Wister and Robert Vaux, two eminent philanthropists, Quakers both, were successively waited upon, and earnestly entreated to accept the position, but they both declined. Robert Vaux was the one last applied to, but, though he was a professed Abolitionist, he could not be persuaded to face the gathering storm. When the committee retired from his house they were conscious that they had at least gone quite as far in their search for a distinguished presiding officer as their self-respect would allow; and Beriah Green said, in a sarcastic tone, "If there is not timber amongst ourselves big enough to make a president of let us get along without one, or go home and stay there till we have grown up to be men."

The delegates, on their way to the Adelphi Building, where the Convention was held, says Samuel J. May, "were repeatedly assailed with most insulting words." As they passed through the door, guarded by a body of policemen, and took their seats in the hall, we need not wonder if they were awed by a sense of the greatness of their task and of their need of Divine help. If I may believe the testimony of some who were present, the disciples of Jesus, when they were assembled together after the crucifixion, to consider what they should do for the propagation of the Christian faith, were no more solemn, tender or prayerful in their mood, than were the members of this Convention in view of the work before them. In such an hour men forget all the petty differences of sect and party, and remember only their humanity and the sacredness of their work. "Never," says Samuel J. May, "have I seen men so ready, so anxious to rid themselves of whatsoever was narrow, selfish or merely denominational. If ever there was a praying assembly, I believe that was one." After a fervent prayer, in which all the members seemed to unite, the Convention was organized by the appointment of the Rev. Beriah Green, of Whitesboro, N. Y., as President, and Wm. Green, Jr., and John G. Whittier as Secretaries. After a free and somewhat informal interchange of thought, it was unanimously agreed that the time had come for the organization of a National Society, and committees were appointed to draft a Constitution and nominate officers. The reports of these committees occupied the Convention during the afternoon. The object of the new Society, as set forth in the Constitution, was "the entire abolition of slavery in the United States." While admitting that each State had exclusive right to legislate in regard to its abolition, it avowed its aim to be to convince the people of the slave States by arguments addressed to their understandings and consciences, that slaveholding was a heinous sin against God, and that duty and safety required its immediate abandonment, without expatriation. It maintained the duty of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and the trade in slaves between the several States, and urged the duty of elevating the character and condition of the free people of color. It pledged the Society, moreover, to discountenance the use of force to secure the freedom of the slaves. From this it will be seen that the members of the Convention were fully aware of all the limitations of the United States Constitution, and that it called upon the National Government to exercise only such powers in relation to slavery as, by the common consent of statesmen of all parties, up to that time, it possessed. It is important to observe this, since the Abolitionists were charged by their opponents with an unintelligent and reckless zeal that overleaped all the barriers of the Constitution, and would free the slaves by means which that instrument forbade. The discussions in Congress and in the newspapers, so far as our opponents were concerned, went on for years upon this false assumption. The slaveholders and their apologists knew that they could resist us successfully only by appeals to popular ignorance and prejudice, and by exciting a wild clamor, in the midst of which the reasonableness of our purposes and plans should be overlooked.

But the Constitution of the Society, as an exposition of its principles, purposes and plans, was thought to be insufficient. It was instinctively felt that there was need of a document of a more imposing character, which should be to the anti-slavery movement what the Declaration of Independence was to the fathers in the Revolutionary struggle. The duty of preparing such a document was assigned to a committee of ten, composed of Messrs. Atlee, Wright, Garrison, Jocelyn, Thurston, Sterling, William Green, Jr., Whittier, Goodell and May. This committee, after a consultation of several hours, in which the nature and design of the proposed paper were carefully considered, appointed a sub-committee of three to draft the same. This sub-committee was composed of Messrs. Garrison, Whittier and May, and after consultation it was determined that Mr. Garrison should write the document. He sat down to the task at ten o'clock in the evening, and when, at 8 o'clock the next morning, Messrs. Whittier and May, according to previous agreement, went to meet him, they found him, with shutters closed and lamps burning, just writing the last paragraph of his admirable draft. The sub-committee, after careful examination and a few slight alterations, laid it before the committee of ten, which, after three hours of careful consideration, reported it to the Convention. It was read to that body by Edwin P. Atlee, chairman of the committee. "Never in my life," says Mr. May, "have I seen a deeper impression made by words than was made by that admirable document upon all who were there present. After the voice of the reader had ceased there was silence for several minutes. Our hearts were in perfect unison. There was but one thought with us all. Either of the members could have told what the whole Convention felt. We felt that the word had just been uttered which would be mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the strongholds of slavery." The Convention then proceeded to consider the paper. It was taken up, paragraph by paragraph, sentence by sentence, and after five hours of discussion, unanimously adopted.

Then it was engrossed upon parchment by the late Abraham L. Cox, M. D., of New York, and on the last day of the Convention, signed by all the delegates, sixty-two in number.

Of this "Declaration of Sentiments," the Magna Charta of the anti-slavery movement, what shall I say? As a specimen of vigorous and pure English it certainly will not suffer by comparison with its model, the Declaration of Independence. The great struggle which it heralded, and whose principles and purposes it so clearly defined, is now over, and most of those whose names were appended to it have entered upon the life beyond; but no man possessed of ordinary human sympathies can read it even now without being deeply moved. It is full of power. Its sentences throb with moral and intellectual vitality. It stirs the heart like the blast of a trumpet. No one who reads it and considers its high purpose and import will think John G. Whittier extravagant when he said: "It will live as long as our national history. I love, perhaps too well, the praise and good-will of my fellow-men; but I set a higher value on my name as appended to that Declaration than on the title-page of any book. Looking over a life marked with many errors and shortcomings, I rejoice that I have been able to maintain the pledge of that signature, and that in the long intervening years

'My voice, though not the loudest, has been heard Wherever Freedom raised her cry of pain.'

The Declaration is too long, of course, to be copied here, but I must bring before the reader a few of its terse and thrilling sentences:—

"With entire confidence in the overruling justice of God, we plant ourselves upon the Declaration of our Independence and the truths of Divine Revelation as upon the Everlasting Rock.

“We shall organize anti-slavery societies, if possible, in every city, town and village in our land.

“We shall send forth agents to lift up the voice of remonstrance, of warning, of entreaty and rebuke.

“We shall circulate unsparingly and extensively anti-slavery tracts and periodicals.

“We shall enlist the pulpit and the press in the cause of the suffering and the dumb.

“We shall aim at the purification of the churches from all participation in the guilt of slavery.

“We shall spare no exertions nor means to bring the whole nation to speedy repentance.

“Our trust for victory is solely in God. We may be personally defeated, but our principles never. Truth, justice, reason, humanity, must and will gloriously triumph. Already a host is coming up to the help of the Lord against the mighty, and the prospect before us is full of encouragement.

“Submitting this declaration to the candid examination of the people of this country, and of the friends of liberty throughout the world, we hereby affix our signatures to it, pledging ourselves that, under the guidance and by the help of Almighty God, we will do all that in us lies, consistently with this declaration of principles, to overthrow the most execrable system of slavery that has ever been witnessed upon earth, to deliver our land from its deadliest curse, to wipe out the foulest stain that rests upon our National escutcheon, and to secure to the colored population of the United States all the rights and privileges which belong to them as men and as Americans, come what may to our persons, our interests, or our reputation; whether we live to witness the triumph of liberty, justice and humanity, or perish untimely as martyrs in this great, benevolent and holy cause.”

Such was the purpose, such the spirit of Garrison and of the whole anti-slavery movement; such it was in the beginning, such it was in every hour of its progress, and to the very end. Here is the fanaticism, the “coarse vituperation” (vide Dr. Whedon), and the “infidelity” from which the American churches turned away in affected disgust; and yet there are those in the churches, even at this day, who would, were it possible, hide from future generations the shame of their delinquency, their recreancy to humanity and to Christ, and meanly throw the responsibility therefor upon those whose only fault was that they showed them the right way and besought them with many prayers and tears to enter into it. There never was an hour when the ministers and churches of this land, if they had had any heart for the work, or any earnest purpose or desire to overthrow slavery, might not have assumed complete control of the anti-slavery movement, and when the persecuted and maligned Abolitionists would not have received them with shouts of gladness, and, to make room for them, consigned themselves, if necessary, to utter obscurity. It was not that they did not choose to follow Mr. Garrison — that of itself was a small matter — but it was that with the whole question within their grasp, with power to appoint such leaders as they pleased, they did nothing — nay, that they virtually took sides with the slaveholders, and tried to screen them from rebuke, weaving apologies for them out of perverted texts of Scripture, and encouraging them to persevere in their sin.

The Convention, after a session of three days, having completed the work for which it convened, adjourned sine die, in a very serious yet hopeful frame of mind, its members returning to their respective homes to do what they might for the furtherance of the cause. The President, the Rev. Beriah Green, made a parting address of singular eloquence and power, that melted the whole body into tears. His closing words were these: —

“ But now we must retire from these balmy influences and breathe another atmosphere. The chill hoar frost will be upon us. The storm and tempest will rise, and the waves of persecution will dash against our souls. Let us be prepared for the worst. Let us fasten ourselves to the throne of God as with hooks of steel. If we cling not to Him, our names to that document [the Declaration] will be as dust. Let us court no applause; indulge in no spirit of vain boasting. Let us be assured that our only hope in grappling with the bony monster is in an Arm that is stronger than ours. Let us fix our gaze on God, and walk in the light of His countenance. If our cause is just — and we know it is — His omnipotence is pledged to its triumph. Let this cause be entwined around the very fibres of our hearts. Let our hearts grow to it, so that nothing but death can sunder the bond.”

Instantly upon closing his address, the President lifted up his voice in a prayer so tender, so solemn, so fervent, so heartfelt, that all present were deeply touched and awed; and then, under the influence of this baptism from on high, the members bade each other farewell, and went out to fight a great battle for God and humanity.

The new Society began its operations promptly and vigorously, making New York its headquarters. Its office was on the corner of Nassau and Spruce streets, on the very spot now occupied by the Tribune Building. Among its officers were a few men of considerable distinction. Arthur Tappan, the President, stood high as a merchant, and was widely known as a liberal supporter of the religious and benevolent societies of the day. His brother Lewis, a man of very remarkable executive force and fertile in plans for promoting the cause, was a member of the Executive Committee. Professor Elizur Wright, Jr., from the Western Reserve College, was the Domestic Corresponding Secretary; William Lloyd Garrison, Secretary of Foreign Correspondence. The Committee, as a whole, was a well chosen and very efficient body of men — every one of them, if I mistake not, an Orthodox Christian. One of its first measures was the adoption as its own of “The Emancipator,” a weekly paper which had existed for several months, under the editorship of Rev. C. W. Denison. William Goodell, a powerful writer and thoroughly familiar with the slavery question, was appointed editor. Arthur Tappan subscribed $3,000—a large sum for that day to be given to any benevolent cause; John Rankin, $1,200, William Green, Jr., $1,000, and other friends lesser sums, to promote the cause. Tracts were printed and sent flying through the land. Among these tracts, if I remember aright, were the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hopkins's "Dialogue on Slavery," and Dr. Jonathan Edwards's famous anti-slavery sermon. Lecturing agents were also sent out. The Society began its work so vigorously and with such a determined purpose, that while its friends were much encouraged, its enemies became more and more angry. Accessions to the cause of both ministers and laymen were numerous, so much so that for a time the hope was indulged that the leaders of the different religious denominations at the North would soon give up their opposition, that the whole body of the churches would wheel into line and the pulpit lift up a united voice in opposition to slavery. This was what we all longed for; for this we incessantly toiled and prayed, for we were then fully aware of the truth, afterward proclaimed by Albert Barnes, that "there was no power outside of the church that would sustain slavery an hour if it were not sustained in it." We saw, therefore, that the terrible responsibility for the existence of slavery rested upon the churches; and we appealed to them, in the name of God and of Christ, and by arguments drawn from the Bible, to abandon their position of open connivance, or of a not less guilty silence, in respect to the sin which made Jefferson tremble for his country when he remembered that God is just. But our pleadings, for the most part, so far as the leaders in the churches were concerned, fell upon dull ears and consciences hardened by long complicity with sin. One powerful ally of our cause at this time was "The New York Evangelist," then edited by the Rev. Joshua Leavitt. It had a considerable circulation, and exerted a wide influence among the "New School" Presbyterians, who were active in the revivals that occurred in connection with the labors of the Rev. Charles G. Finney. It advocated the cause with zeal and earnestness, and many clergymen and laymen were led by it to declare themselves Abolitionists. When Mr. Leavitt withdrew from "The Evangelist" to become editor of "The Emancipator," the anti-slavery tone of the former became quite feeble, in compliance, no doubt, with the well-understood desire of the larger number of its readers. It was never afterward an Abolition paper, but, with certain anti-slavery tendencies, a supporter of the New School Presbyterian Church, which James G. Birney said was one of the "bulwarks of slavery."

The Society held its first anniversary May 6, 1834, taking the place in "Anniversary Week" which it ever afterward held among the religious and philanthropic associations of the country. At this meeting it took one step which caused much excitement. The American Bible Society had been engaged in supplying every family in the United States with a Bible, and had announced to the British Society the completion of this work. But it had taken no more account of the scores of thousands of families of slaves than of "the cattle upon a thousand hills," or of the wild beasts that roamed the forests. The Anti-Slavery Society passed a resolution calling public attention to this omission, and offering, if the Bible Society would appropriate $20,000 for this purpose, to put into its treasury one-quarter of that sum. A committee, of which Mr. Lewis Tappan was the chairman, was made the bearer of this proposition to the board of managers of the Bible Society. Mr. Tappan having presented it, asked permission to say a few words in explanation; but he was denied a hearing, and no mention of the matter whatever appeared in the official report of the society's proceedings. Considering that the slaveholders and their allies always insisted that the Bible sanctioned slavery, their unwillingness that the slaves should read it for themselves appears not a little strange.

The agitation had now gained such headway that the pro-slavery party became desperate. The press of the country, with some noble exceptions, teemed with misrepresentations and denunciations of Abolitionists, which sounded strangely enough when compared with the complaints made of them in the same quarter on account of their alleged severity. I regret to say that the religious was not less abusive than the secular press. Here and there a religious paper treated the subject with something like reasonable fairness, but as a general rule the organs of the different sects were bitterly hostile. The Methodist paper of New England, "Zion's Herald," which was not under ecclesiastical control, was friendly; but "The Christian Advocate" of New York, the official organ of the Methodist church, was filled with gross abuse of the Abolitionists. As there appears to be a disposition in some quarters to deny or conceal these ugly facts, and to make the Abolitionists themselves responsible, through their alleged imprudence and recklessness, for the opposition they met with, let me fortify my own testimony by citing that of the Rev. William Goodell, who was a Calvinist of the Calvinists to the day of his death. "The religious presses," he says, "of the principal sects at the North, particularly of the Congregationalist sect, in the hands of the conservative party, were the first to traduce, to misrepresent, to vilify and to oppose the Abolitionists, representing them as anarchists, Jacobins, vilifiers of great and good men, incendiaries, plotters of insurrection and disunion, and enemies of the public peace." And now behold! When the shameful complicity of the churches of that day with slavery, their bitter opposition to the anti-slavery movement, and their persecution of such of their own members as were Abolitionists, are exposed, the attempt is made to build a wall for their protection out of the toils and sacrifices of the men whom they opposed and denounced. In other words, the fidelity of a proscribed and persecuted Christian minority is imputed as a merit to the whole church, while the attempt is made to conceal from the present and future generations the shameful action of the ruling majority. Does any Christian imagine that God can look with any other feelings than those of abhorrence and indignation upon such efforts to pervert the truth of history? In the interest of Christianity itself, and as a warning to the ages to come, let the truth be proclaimed without fear or favor. Perish all the arts of evasion and concealment by which ambitious ecclesiastics would defend their craft at the expense of truth and justice, and hide the blot, not on Christianity, but on the escutcheon of a recreant church! Judgment in this case, as of old, must begin at the house of God — with those, in other words, whose religious professions gave them power to mislead the community and pervert the right way of the Lord.

But I may be asked, did the leaders of the churches, the men of influence and might, openly advocate slavery as a good thing? Oh, no indeed! If they had done that we should speedily have overmastered them. Their hostility was disguised under a great variety of specious pleas and pretences. They were "just as much opposed to slavery as the Abolitionists, but,—" and then would follow one or more of such allegations as these: Immediate emancipation would be dangerous; the slaves would cut their masters' throats if set free; they are not prepared for freedom; they are contented and happy, and wouldn't take their freedom if it were offered to them; they ought not to be set free in this country, but to be taken back to Africa, where they belong; would you like to marry your daughter to a "nigger"? the Bible sanctions slavery; the curse of Ham doomed his posterity to bondage forever, and the Scriptures must be fulfilled; the chosen people of God held slaves by Divine permission; Jesus did not condemn slavery, and Paul expressly sustained the system by sending the slave Onesimus back to his master; the agitation of the subject will divide the churches and divert their attention from religious work; the Abolitionists are too indiscriminate in their denunciations; of course, slavery in the hands of bad men is wrong, but there are thousands of good slaveholders, who treat their slaves kindly; the slaves are property, and it would be cruel to deprive the masters, without compensation, of that for which they paid their money; the Constitution guarantees slavery, and without such guarantees the Union never could have been formed; the discussion of the subject is dangerous to the peace of the country, and tends to a dissolution of the Union. In this list of excuses, which might be greatly extended, there is not the slightest touch of caricature, as every Abolitionist of that day now living will testify. I have heard them myself, ad nauseam, from the lips of clergymen and laymen, and read them a hundred times in the newspapers. Slavery, it was insisted, was not in itself a sin; and, curiously enough, the innocent slaveholders were always those who were most enlightened, who were members of the Christian Church, and whose example, therefore, did more than all else to sustain the system. Men who would have blushed to affirm that pious men might be gamblers or pickpockets, were not ashamed to plead that slavery was sanctified by the goodness and piety of the masters. The profane man, who swore at his slaves and treated them cruelly, was a great sinner of course; but the religious man, who called them in to family prayers and instructed them in their duties to God and to one another, was no sinner. Slavery, when mixed up with oaths and curses and cruelty, was indeed dreadful: but when well seasoned with prayers, exhortations and nosannas, it was very tolerable! Ecclesiastical bodies, feeling the necessity of seeming at least to oppose slavery, passed cunningly-worded resolves, in which "holding slaves for gain" was condemned, it being quietly assumed, if not asserted, that religious slaveholders held their slaves from other and higher motives. Learned expositors of Scripture — men to whom the churches looked with confidence as safe guides — wrote ingenious articles in magazines and reviews, in which they put forth all their dialectical skill and metaphysical subtlety to prove that holding property in man was not necessarily sinful, and that the demand for immediate emancipation was pure fanaticism. These expositors found an echo in the religious press, and preachers, instead of rebuking iniquity in high places, volunteered, in many instances, to

"Hang another flower
Of earthly sort about the sacred truth,
And mix the bitter text
With relish suited to the sinner's taste."

Thus the slaveholders who felt the force of the warnings and rebukes of the Abolitionists, were comforted in their sin, and encouraged to resist the demand for emancipation. Under such influences is it any wonder that the South "hardened her neck as in the day of provocation," and went on from one step of madness to another, until at last, in the hope of perpetuating her diabolical system, she plunged into a bloody rebellion? And when slavery was thus defended in church and pulpit and in all the high places of the land, what wonder if the lower stratum of society caught the infection and became infuriated in its hostility to the Abolitionists? Is it strange that a meeting of the Abolitionists of New York, assembled on the Fourth of July to listen to a famous orator from Philadelphia, was broken up by a mob, and that for several successive days and nights the city was in the possession of the rioters, who assaulted private dwellings and places of public worship? I am not sure whether it was in this or a subsequent riot that the Laight Street Presbyterian Church, of which the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hanson Cox was the pastor, was violently assailed and much damaged. Dr. Cox had lately been in England, and having caught the anti-slavery fire from the clergy of that country, he came home full of zeal, and evidently impressed with the belief that he could speedily enlist the churches of this country in a crusade against slavery. He preached on the subject in his own pulpit with much warmth, and in one of his sermons, on the subject of prejudice against color, he happened to remark that Jesus, born as he was in an Oriental clime, was probably a man of a swarthy complexion, who, if living in this country, might not be received into good society. This observation was reported with exaggerations in the newspapers, and commented upon in such a way as to inflame the passions of the vulgar. While the mob was engaged in smashing the windows of the church, a gentleman who had been drawn to the spot by motives of curiosity, asked one of the rioters what was the reason for the attack. "Why," said the rioter, in reply, "Dr. Cox says our Saviour is a nigger, and — me if I don't think his church ought to be torn down." It was in these days that the house of Mr. Lewis Tappan was sacked and its furniture destroyed. There were riots also in Philadelphia about the same time, in which the houses of many colored people were assailed, and several lives were sacrificed. The public mind throughout the country was in an inflamed condition, and the press, by misrepresentations and appeals to popular ignorance and prejudice, was constantly fanning the excitement.

But in the midst of this darkness there was a sudden gleam of light, which filled the hearts of the Abolitionists with fresh hope. The Hon. William Jay, noble son of a noble sire, espoused the cause, and put forth a work in its defence which will live as a monument of his intellectual power as well as of his philanthropy and courage. It was entitled "An Inquiry into the Character and Tendencies of the American Colonization and the American Anti-Slavery Societies." It was full of light and truth, and admirably adapted to convince any candid person who would read it of the righteousness and wisdom of the anti-slavery movement. It appeared at a most opportune moment, and exerted a powerful influence in many quarters. But the author's noble name and his judicial eminence did not save him from the fierce denunciations of the pro-slavery press. He was roundly abused on all sides, and not long afterward lost his place on the bench in consequence of his abolitionism. He was appointed a member of the Executive Committee of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and filled the place for many years with great fidelity. His trained mind, his ripe judgment and wide legal knowledge were a great acquisition to the cause. He was a devoted Christian and a man of large influence in the Protestant Episcopal Church. How faithful he was in rebuking that Church for its complicity with slavery, all the friends of the cause gratefully remember. His pen was always at the service of the oppressed, and his collected anti-slavery writings are a monument of his industry and devotion, and an illustration of the nobleness and the grandeur of the cause which the American churches rejected and contemned.

This year (1834) was also signalized by the peaceful emancipation of 800,000 slaves in the British West India Islands. The event took place on the 1st of August, and the Abolitionists awaited the result with intense interest, but not a shadow of doubt. They knew that obedience to God in the breaking of the chains of so many slaves would be perfectly safe; and so it proved, for not a drop of blood was shed; the negroes received their freedom with grateful joy as a boon from Heaven, and all the predictions of the proslavery party were falsified. Naturally enough, American Abolitionists were mightily encouraged by this intelligence to persevere in their labors.

X.

The Lane Theological Seminary — Arthur Tappan and Dr. Beecher — A Remarkable Class of Students — Discussion of the Slavery Question — Conversion of the Students to Abolitionism — Intense Excitement — The Students Become Missionaries — The Trustees Enact a Gag-Law — The Faculty Submits — Dr. Beecher Yields to Temptation and Goes into Eclipse — The Students Refuse the Gag and Ask for a Dismission — The Faculty in Self-Defence, etc.

MR. ARTHUR TAPPAN, not long after he procured Mr. Garrison's release from the Baltimore jail, gave ten thousand dollars to the Lane Theological Seminary, at Cincinnati, upon the condition that Dr. Lyman Beecher should become its President. The churches of the North and East were then just beginning to perceive that the day was not far distant when the centre of moral and political influence in this country would be in the vast and then comparatively unsettled region drained by the Mississippi; and hence there was much zeal and not a little organized effort to anticipate the oncoming tide of population that was so soon to fill that immense territory, and to provide, in advance, educational institutions suited to its needs. The founding of Lane Seminary, at the gateway of the great West, was a part of this plan, and Dr. Beecher, being generally recognized as the leader of New England Revivalism, and the strongest representative of the advanced school of Orthodoxy at that day, Mr. Tappan thought that he of all others was the man best fitted to train a body of ministers for the new field. The Doctor, after considerable delay, and to the great grief of his Boston church, accepted the appointment. Such was his fame, that a large class of students, of unusual maturity of judgment and ripeness of Christian experience, was at once attracted to the Seminary. In the literary and theological departments together, they numbered about one hundred and ten. Eleven of these were from different slave States; seven were sons of slaveholders; one was himself a slaveholder, and one had purchased his freedom from cruel bondage by the payment of a large sum of money, which he had earned by extra labor. Besides these there were ten others who had resided for longer or shorter periods in the slave States, and made careful observation of the character and workings of slavery. The youngest of these students was nineteen years of age; most of those in the theological department were more than twenty-six, and several were over thirty. Most if not all of them had been converted in the revivals of that period, and were filled with the revival spirit, in which Dr. Beecher so much delighted. A more earnest and devoted band of students was probably never gathered in any theological seminary. The Doctor had great pride as well as confidence in them.

Soon after the Seminary was opened the students formed a Colonization Society, and were encouraged by the faculty to manifest such an interest in the slavery question as was compatible with a scheme for sending the negroes to Africa. So much, it was thought, might be permitted without endangering the union of the States or the peace of the churches, and with safety to the Seminary itself. In the winter of 1833-34, after the publication of Garrison's "Thoughts on Colonization," and the organization of the American Anti-Slavery Society, with Arthur Tappan at its head, the students began to think about slavery and their duties to "the heathen at home." They proposed to hold meetings for the discussion of the subject, and so informed their teachers. Most of the faculty advised them to let the subject alone; but Dr. Beecher said to the committee that waited upon him "Go ahead, boys — that's right; I'll go in and discuss with you." The students, thus encouraged by the President, were confirmed in the conviction that, as men intending to be ministers of the Gospel, in a slaveholding country, it was their duty to study the subject of slavery patiently and thoroughly; and, as there were among them representatives of the slave as well as of the free States, they thought a frank, open and friendly discussion would be both interesting and profitable.

The discussion began in February, 1834. An earlier day was at first proposed, but the disputants on the pro-slavery side asked for more time to prepare themselves for the argument. "You Abolitionists," they said, "have studied the subject; the rest of us haven't; you must give us more time." This request was cheerfully granted. When the time for opening the discussion came, it was agreed to consider two questions, viz.:

1st. Whether the people of the slaveholding States ought to abolish slavery at once, and without prescribing, as a condition, that the emancipated should be sent to Liberia, or elsewhere, out of the country?

2d. Whether the doctrines, tendencies, measures, spirit of the Colonization Society were such as to render it worthy of the patronage of Christian people?

Dr. Beecher, instead of appearing at the first meeting, according to his declared purpose, sent a note to Mr. Weld, saying that, upon the whole, he thought it was not best for him to be present, but that his daughter Catherine would attend as his representative. The students afterwards learned that the Doctor changed his purpose by advice of the trustees. His daughter attended the first meeting, which was wholly occupied by the speaker to whom had been assigned the duty of opening the debate. The next day she sent a letter replying to the speaker's argument, and asking that it might be read to the students. This request was complied with at the next meeting, the speaker who was thus reviewed answering Miss Beecher, point by point, as he read her communication. One member of the faculty, Prof. John Morgan, honored himself by attending the discussion throughout. He was ever afterwards an outspoken Abolitionist. For the last forty-five years he has been a distinguished member of the theological faculty of Oberlin.

The questions were taken up in their order, and each of them discussed, during nine evenings. I have often conversed with some of the men who took part in the debate, and they agree in assuring me that from first to last it was conducted in a candid, prayerful and Christian spirit. There was great earnestness, but no unworthy heat, and no impeachment of the motives of the disputants on either side. The whole discussion was marked by a strong desire to discover and follow the truth, and by a depth of fraternal feeling that was most remarkable. The leader in the discussion was Theodore D. Weld, a young man from Connecticut, famous as a public speaker even before he entered the seminary; a man of great originality and force of character, and highly esteemed for his piety and self-consecration. He had travelled in the South, keeping his eyes and ears open, and gathering information in relation to slavery, which enabled him to debate the subject intelligently as well as eloquently. The result of the discussion, when it is remembered that the disputants embraced men from the slave as well as the free States, seems very remarkable. Upon the first question debated every student voted in the affirmative. "The North gave up, the South kept not back," both being united in proclaiming immediate emancipation to be the right of the slave and the duty of the master. When the vote upon the second question was taken, one faint voice only was heard in the affirmative; and that was the voice of a man who said in the beginning that he "defied the Abolitionists to wring out of him a vote against the Colonization Society." If he was convinced, it was against his will, and so his opinion was not changed.

The students immediately organized an anti-slavery society, while the Colonization Society, previously formed, perished because the blood was all drawn from its veins. The anti-slavery work wrought in the minds and hearts of the students was so deep and thorough that it could only be ascribed to the influences of the Divine Spirit. They were not only brought into closer affinity with each other, but a missionary spirit was kindled in their hearts, impelling them, like their Master, "to seek and to save the lost." Their attention was naturally drawn to the three thousand colored people of Cincinnati, most of whom had been slaves. They formed a committee, each member of which pledged himself to give one evening a week to teaching the colored people, and to furnish a substitute in case of emergency. Thus two evening schools, with pupils from fifteen to sixty years of age, were in progress each evening, except Sunday. Augustus Wattles, one of the students, taking Mr. Weld with him, went to Dr. Beecher and opened his heart in substance as follows: "When I came here three months ago," he said, "from the State of New York, I had been for a year the President of a Colonization Society; I had discussed and lectured in its favor; I did unremittingly what I now see was a great wrong. I must do what I can to undo that wrong. Here in Cincinnati are three thousand colored people, most of them in great ignorance. Last night I could not sleep. My present duty is plain, which is to take a dismissal from the seminary, throw myself among these three thousand outcasts, establish schools, and work in all practicable ways for their elevation." Dr. Beecher, as well as Mr. Wattles, was moved to tears. The Doctor gave him his dismissal, adding, "Go, my son, and may God be with you."

Mr. Wattles at once established, in one of the colored churches, a school, which he taught gratuitously. A colored man, once a Kentucky slave, gave him his board; another lodged him. His advent among these people was to them as life from the dead. In a few months, in co-operation with a committee of Abolitionists in the seminary, he had established four more schools, taught by four noble young women, who came from Connecticut and New York, and one (a sister of Prof. Elizur Wright, Jr.) from the Western Reserve. All these came in the spirit of missionaries and martyrs, identifying themselves with the colored people, living sometimes in their families, at other times boarding themselves, and at all times and in all ways doing with their might what their hands and hearts found to do for the three thousand victims of pro-slavery prejudice and scorn, among whom they had cast their lot. "I know," says the friend from whom I have obtained these facts, "of no nobler consecration than that of these four young women, and of Augustus Wattles, in their tireless labors of love in the lanes and alleys of Cincinnati, in their unselfish ministry to the poorest of the suffering poor. One of the students, who was acquainted with Arthur Tappan, wrote to him the details of Wattles's work at the outset, and of the offer of the four young women to teach, without price, the schools that he was establishing. Mr. Tappan immediately authorized the student to draw upon him at sight for the travelling expenses of the young women from their homes to Cincinnati; for books, maps and fixtures for their schools and for that of Mr. Wattles, and carte blanche for whatever in his judgment might be necessary for their personal comfort, and to secure the most substantial practical results of their labors of love."

Cincinnati, though on the northern bank of the Ohio, was saturated with the spirit of slavery. Its trade was derived largely from the South, and many of the inhabitants were from that region. It was scarcely less fatal to a man's reputation to be known as an Abolitionist there than it would have been in Richmond or New Orleans. The laws of Ohio in respect to negroes, having been dictated by emigrants from the South, were infamous in their proscriptive force. Against these cruel laws the churches lifted up no voice of protest, while religious men of every denomination aided in enacting and enforcing them. The average Cincinnati was as ready to catch and return a fugitive slave as he was to return to his owner a stray horse or dog. The press of the city was hardly less servile to the slaveholders than that of Charleston or Mobile. No wonder, therefore, that the discussion in Lane Seminary, and the results to which it led, caused intense excitement in that slavery-ridden city. "Mr. Wattles and the lady teachers," says the friend to whom I am indebted for many of the facts in this narrative, "were daily hissed and cursed, loaded with vulgar and brutal epithets, oaths and threats; filth and offal were often thrown at them as they came and went; and the ladies especially were assailed by grossest obscenity, called by the vilest names, and subjected to every indignity of speech which bitterness and diabolism could frame. So also the students, known to be conspicuous as Abolitionists, were constantly in receipt of letters filled with threats, to be executed unless they discontinued lectures and teachings among the colored people. These letters often enclosed pictures of hearts thrust full and through with daggers; throats cut, heads cut off, bloody tongues hanging from bleeding mouths, etc. One of the students had a special place of deposit for these Satanic curiosities, and kept piling them in till, from sheer nausea, his gorge so rose that he emptied the contents of the reeking tophet into their own place."

Two of the students, James A. Thome of Kentucky, and Henry B. Stanton of Connecticut, went by invitation to the first anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society in New York, in 1834, and electrified the country by their eloquent testimonies against slavery. Then there burst immediately upon Lane Seminary and its brave students a storm of indignation, before which the managers of the institution quailed. These young men might have gone to a meeting of the Bible Society or of the A. B. C. F. M., to make a plea in behalf of the heathen abroad, and no one would have accused them of any impropriety — nay, they would have been universally applauded for doing a work appropriate for young men studying for the ministry; but that they should presume to expose the wrongs of American slaves, or speak a word for over "two millions of human beings in this Christian Republic," who, according to the testimony of the Presbyterian Synod of Georgia and South Carolina, uttered but a few months before, were "in the condition of heathen, and in some respects in a worse condition," and such as "justly to bear a comparison with heathen in any part of the world," was regarded as an impertinence deserving the severest rebuke. Mr. Thome, by the revelations he made of slaveholding practices in Kentucky, of which he had been an eye-witness, made himself an exile from his native State, and the religious press of the country treated him as one who had received no more than he deserved!

In every part of the free States there were Christian men, and godly women not a few, who prayed to God night and day that Lyman Beecher might be imbued with strength and courage to stand up nobly in the face of the storm that raged around him, and maintain the right of his pupils, as candidates for the Christian ministry, to investigate and discuss the subject of slavery, and to bear their testimony against it as a sin, and a mighty hindrance to the spread of the Gospel. They remembered the brave words he had spoken against the then fashionable sin of intemperance; they called to mind his earlier denunciations of duelling as a crime; they thought of his zeal to carry the Gospel to the dark places of the world; and they were unwilling to believe that in this terrible crisis he would yield to the demands of the Slave Power, and seek to put a padlock upon the lips of the noble young men in whom he had taken so much pride, and upon whose future he had built such exalted hopes. They knew that, by force of all that was noblest and grandest in his nature, he belonged to freedom's side, and they could not bear to think that he would commit such an outrage upon himself as to go with the pro-slavery party in such a crisis. He had been my pastor in my fresh young manhood, and my affection for him was deep and strong. He had married me with his blessing to the wife of my youth, and had shown me many attentions, such as a young man prizes very highly when received from one so eminent; and to the last moment I kept alive in my heart the hope that he would, in spite of previous waverings, make a final stand for freedom of speech, in the seminary as well as elsewhere, for the purification of the church, and for the overthrow of the foulest system of oppression with which the groaning earth was cursed. But I was doomed to a bitter disappointment. The fancied temporary interests of the seminary and of the Presbyterian Church were in one scale, the eternal principles of liberty and the rights of the trampled and outraged slaves in the other; and the latter, by the touch of his hand, were made to kick the beam! In the absence of the faculty, during vacation, the trustees had made a rule requiring the students to disband their anti-slavery society, and, to give an appearance of consistency, the Colonization Society as well, though since the anti-slavery discussion it had been dead beyond the power of resurrection. Other restrictions were also put upon the students, for the purpose of effectually preventing the agitation of the slavery question in the future.

One of the trustees was the Rev. Asa Mahan, afterwards for twenty years the President of Oberlin College. Of course he opposed the passage of the gag-law, which, as originally introduced to the board, forbade the students to discuss the question of slavery at all, even in private,—the words being “at the table and elsewhere.” Dr. Mahan—so I learn from high authority—moved that these words be stricken out. The motion was at first stoutly opposed, but upon the suggestion being made that such a cast-iron rule, laid upon the students of a Theological Seminary, would savor more of the dark ages, the Inquisition, and the Star-chamber, than of the enlightenment of the nineteenth century, it was voted to omit the words—on the score of policy!

Dr. Beecher and his associates in the faculty, on returning to their duties in the fall, had to decide whether they would or would not consent to enforce these disgraceful laws, set up in the interest of the Slave Power. Their conclusion to obey the behest of the trustees, though a cruel disappointment to the students and to the struggling friends of freedom throughout the country, was hailed with exultation by the pro-slavery press. It was a sad day for the slaves and their friends, and a sad day also for Lane Seminary ; for the anti-slavery students, though plied with all the arts of persuasion of which Dr. Beecher was master, calmly refused to bend their necks to the yoke. Nearly all of the theological students, seventy or eighty in number, took their dismissal from the institution, leaving it in a bare and crippled condition for years. Before doing so, however, they issued, under their own names, an eloquent and impressive appeal to the Christian public, prepared by a committee consisting of Theodore D. Weld, James A. Thome, George Whipple, Henry B. Stanton, and Sereno W. Streeter. In the main, no doubt, it was the production of Mr. Weld, who, in point of native ability, it is not too much to say, was the peer of Dr. Beecher himself. After a long period of invaluable service in the anti-slavery field as lecturer and writer, he has for many years devoted his great powers, enriched by ripest culture and experience, to the instruction of the young. Mr. Thome, after serving fifteen years as a professor at Oberlin, became pastor of a church in Cleveland. He is now dead. Mr. Whipple was a professor at Oberlin for twenty years, then for a long period Secretary of the American Missionary Association, and finally, at the time of his decease, President-elect of Howard University at Washington. Mr. Streeter was for some years Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in an Ohio College, and has since been a pastor. Mr. Stanton, served the anti-slavery cause until 1840, after which he entered the legal profession.

The answer of the faculty to the appeal of the students, though dialectically and rhetorically skilful, was weak and sophistical in argument. Some parts of it read strangely enough in the light of the present day. The faculty admitted that the students had not been drawn away from their studies, or led into any neglect of duty by the discussion which had given so much offence. "We never witnessed," they said, "more power of mind or capacity of acquisition, or of felicitous communication in popular eloquence, in the same number of individuals; and we add that the attainments of the past year, as developed by daily intercourse and by the closing examination, were honorable to them and satisfactory to us. We always have believed, and still do believe, that they have acted under the influence of piety and conscience." Why, then, were they gagged? Oh, because discussions on slavery had "a bearing upon a divided and excited community;" because the subject was one of "great national difficulty and high political interest;" and because the discussion, though under the control of "piety and conscience," and pursued without any interruption of the course of study, had yet been "conducted in a manner to offend needlessly public sentiment, and to commit the seminary and its influences contrary" to the advice of the faculty. And so the faculty deliberately committed it and its influences to the pro-slavery side! Moreover, some of the students had been very "imprudent." One of them, who had gone from Walnut Hills to the city to deliver an evening lecture to the colored people, being "too much indisposed to return to the seminary, accepted ('give ear, O Earth!') the hospitality of a respectable colored family to pass the night with them." Another, a teacher of a colored school ("hung be the heavens in black!"), actually "boarded in a colored family." How could it be expected that the people of Cincinnati would be able to reconcile their delicate feelings to outrages like these? And what would the American churches, which were sending their missionaries to war against caste in India, say to such imprudent disregard of caste at home? Worse than all (O horror of horrors!), "several female colored persons," wishing, doubtless, to see some of the students in regard to their missionary work, "visited the seminary in a carriage," and were courteously received by the young missionaries! The faculty, in this awful state of things, called the students together, not to commend and encourage them for behaving worthily of their Christian profession, but to persuade them, in deference to the vulgar pro-slavery spirit of the times, "to abstain from the apparent intention of carrying the doctrine of intercourse with the colored people into practical effect," and pressing "a collateral benevolent enterprise in a manner subversive of the confidence of the entire Christian community." "The entire Christian community!" Let these words be remembered, for they show by plain implication what the Abolitionists in their godlike work had to contend with, and what was the real attitude of the church and the ministry at that time. We are asked to believe that the men who had not the courage to rebuke the meanest and most inhuman exhibition of caste that the world has ever seen were chosen of God to bear upon their shoulders the Ark of the Covenant in the presence of a scoffing world, and to keep the fire on God's altar from going out!

I verily believe that, if Lyman Beecher had been true to Christ and to liberty in that trying hour, the whole course of American history in regard to slavery would have been changed, and that the slaves might have been emancipated without the shedding of blood. The churches at that hour were halting between the good and the evil side, and it only needed the example of one strong man like Dr. Beecher to rally them to their legitimate place as the foremost champions of justice and liberty. He sacrificed a great opportunity, as Webster did in 1850, and linked his name forever with those of the trimmers and compromisers of that day. He inflicted a wound upon his own reputation from which he never recovered. He lost the confidence of the friends of freedom; while the champions and apologists of slavery respected him far less than they would if he had shown himself worthy of his New England blood. As Lowell sings:—

“Man is more than [institutions]; better rot beneath the sod, Than be true to Church and State, while we are doubly false to God.”

Some of the exiled students completed their education in the freer air of Oberlin, while a few did noble service in the anti-slavery cause as lecturing agents. Conspicuous among the latter were Theodore D. Weld, Henry B. Stanton and Marius R. Robinson, who, by their logic and eloquence, did much to enlighten the people and create the public sentiment which finally led to the overthrow of slavery. Mr. Weld's Bible argument against slavery, his "Slavery as It Is, or, the Testimony of a Thousand Witnesses," and other publications of a similar character, which were scattered broadcast by the American Anti-Slavery Society, exerted a great influence. Mr. Stanton was for a time one of the Secretaries of the National Society, devoting himself to the work of organizing the system of petitioning Congress for such anti-slavery action as that body could constitutionally take, and in the collection of funds for the Society's treasury.

Of Mr. Robinson there is a tale to be told, which coming generations ought to hear. A more gentle, sweet-spirited and self-consecrated man I have never known. He was exceedingly modest, never seeking conspicuity, but willing to work in any place, however obscure, to which duty called him. For a time, after leaving the Seminary, he devoted himself to the welfare of the colored people of Cincinnati, and, for aught that I know, was one of those who were so "imprudent" as sometimes to take a meal with a colored family. It would have been just like him to do so, simple-hearted man that he was. Then he was for a time in the office of Mr. Birney's "Philanthropist," and, when the mob came to destroy the types, it was his tact and courage that saved the "forms" from being broken up, so that the paper of the week was printed in an adjoining town and delivered to its subscribers on time. At a later day he entered the lecturing field in Ohio, where he did noble service, enduring all manner of hardness like a good soldier of freedom. He was a capital speaker, with much that we call magnetic force for lack of a better term, and he was sure to make a deep impression wherever he could get a hearing. It was during the "reign of terror," and he was often harried by mobs and other exhibitions of pro-slavery malevolence. At Granville, Licking County, he was detained some time by severe illness. One day a constable obtruded himself into his sick-room, and served upon him a paper, a copy of which I herewith present as a specimen of the pro-slavery literature of that day:—

"LICKING Co., GRANVILLE TOWNSHIP, SS.

"To H. C. Mead, Constable of said Township, GREETING.

"Whereas, we, the undersigned, overseers of the poor of Granville Township, have received information that there has lately come into said Township a certain poor man, named Robinson, who is not a legal resident thereof, and will be likely to become a township charge; you are, therefore, hereby commanded forthwith to warn the said Robinson, with his family, to depart out of said Township. And of this warrant make service and return. Given under our hands this first day of March, 1839.

CHARLES GILMAN, } Overseers of
S. BANCROFT, } the Poor."

It was nearly two years before this that he went to Berlin, Mahoning County, to deliver several lectures. On Friday evening, June 2, 1837, he spoke for the first time, and notice was given that on the following Sunday he would deliver a lecture to vindicate the Bible from the charge of supporting slavery. This was more than the public sentiment of Berlin could bear, and so, on Saturday evening, he was seized by a band of ruffians — two of them, I am told, members of the Presbyterian Church — dragged out of the house of the friend with whom he lodged, carried several miles away, and, besides many other insults, subjected to the cruel indignity of a coat of tar and feathers. In this condition he was carried some miles further, and, in the darkness of a chilly Sunday morning, having been denuded of much of his clothing, left in an open field, in a strange place, where he knew no one to whom to look for aid. After daylight he made his way to the nearest house, but the family was frightened at his appearance, and would render him no aid. At another house he was fortunate enough to find friends, who, in the spirit of the good Samaritan, had compassion on him and supplied his needs. The bodily injuries received on that dreadful night affected his health ever afterwards, and even aggravated the pain of his dying hours. But they brought no bitterness to his heart, which was full of tenderness toward those who had wronged him. He gave himself with fresh zeal to the work of reform, and few men have ever done more than he did to make purer and sweeter the moral atmosphere of the region in which he lived. In 1851 he became editor of "The Anti-Slavery Bugle," at Salem, Ohio, and conducted it till the time of its discontinuance, after the abolition of slavery was substantially assured. His editorial services were of great value, and won for him the admiration and the confidence of those who profited thereby. He died in Salem less than a year ago, respected and beloved by the whole community.

It seems incredible now that the pulpit of that day was generally silent in the presence of outrages like those inflicted upon Mr. Robinson, and that leading newspapers spoke of them rather to condemn the victims than the authors. But such is the fact. Those who imagine that the conflict with the Slave Power began with the organization of the anti-slavery political parties need to be reminded that no such parties could have had an existence but for the grand moral struggle that preceded them, and that was sustained for years by men and women who endured, bravely and unflinchingly, the reproach and scorn of hostile communities, and whose property and lives were often in peril.

XI.

Progress of the Cause — Madness of the Opposition — Southern Threats and Northern Menaces — Firmness of Arthur Tappan — Northern Colleges — Mutilation of Books — Beginning of a “Reign of Terror” — Movement of Conservatives in Boston — James G. Birney — Anti-Slavery Publications Sent to the South — Post-Office in Charleston Broken Open by a Mob — Pro-Slavery Demonstration in Boston — Mob of “Gentlemen of Property and Standing” — Garrison Dragged Through the Streets and Thrust into Jail — Dr. Channing’s Tribute to the Abolitionists.

FROM the time of the organization of the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1833, to the end of the following year, the anti-slavery agitation grew more and more intense, until at last it arrested the attention of the whole country. “The Liberator” in Boston, and “The Emancipator” in New York, had each enlarged its circulation. “The New York Evangelist,” under the editorship of the Rev. Joshua Leavitt, was doing the cause good service in the places most under the influence of the revivals of that period, while a small number of other papers in different parts of the country were friendly to the movement. The American Society was sending out its agents and scattering its tracts and other publications broadcast through the land. Anti-slavery societies were springing up on every side, ministers here and there ventured to preach against slavery, and there were movements in some of the ecclesiastical bodies that seemed to presage a favorable change in the attitude of the churches. There were signs of an effort on the part of the Methodists of New England to break the silence so long imposed by the leaders of that church. Hitherto all efforts to crush the new movement had not only proved unsuccessful, but actually aided in fanning the excitement. The South was full of rage and fury, and the apologists of slavery at the North were growing more and more reckless and unscrupulous. The air was full of misrepresentations of the principles and designs of the Abolitionists, who were pelted by the pro-slavery press everywhere with the most odious epithets, such as "fanatics," "disorganizers," "amalgamationists," "traitors," "jacobins," "incendiaries," "cut-throats," "infidels" — the latter term being directed especially against those who were so bold as to deny that the Bible sanctioned slavery. This tide of abuse, issuing from political and religious journals of wide influence, had a powerful effect upon the lower stratum of society in the cities and large towns, and indeed in smaller places as well. Anti-slavery meetings were often interrupted, and in some instances broken up by mobs; and instead of condemning these outrages, popular newspapers apologized for them, throwing the blame not upon those who organized and took part in them, but upon the Abolitionists, who, it was alleged, persisted in discussing a subject with which they had no right to intermeddle. The enemies of the cause appeared to be under the delusion that it could be crushed out by persecution and violence; that the men who had undertaken the work of abolishing slavery were so wanting in courage that they would fly from the field to save their property and their persons from harm. These men had somehow contrived to read the lessons of history backwards, imagining that the way to stop a conflagration was to pour oil upon the flames!

Such was the state of things at the beginning of the year 1835, which has often been described as pre-eminently the "mob year" in the history of the cause. True, the pro-slavery mobs neither began nor ended with that year, but they were more numerous then than at any previous or subsequent time. The social, ecclesiastical and commercial pressure brought to bear upon leading Abolitionists during that year was tremendous. Arthur Tappan, especially, was beset by leading merchants and moneyed men, presidents of banks and insurance companies, and by influential members of the churches, who besought him, by his regard for his public and private reputation, as well as for his business interests, to resign the office of President of the American Anti-Slavery Society and withdraw himself from the agitation. "You ask me," he said in reply, "to betray my principles, to be false to God and humanity: I WILL BE HANGED FIRST!" The Rev. Samuel J. May, while sitting upon the platform at the anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1835, was called to the door by a partner in one of the most prominent mercantile houses in New York, who said to him, "Mr. May, we are not such fools as not to know that slavery is a great evil, a great wrong. But it was consented to by the founders of our Republic. It was provided for in the Constitution of our Union. A great portion of the property of the Southerners is invested under its sanction; and the business of the North as well as the South has become adjusted to it. There are millions upon millions of dollars due from Southerners to the merchants and mechanics of New York alone, the payment of which would be jeopardized by any rupture between the North and the South. We cannot afford, sir, to let you and your associates succeed in your endeavor to overthrow slavery. It is not a matter of principle with us; it is a matter of business necessity. We cannot afford to let you succeed; and I have called you out to let you know, and to let your fellow-laborers know, that we do not mean to allow you to succeed. We mean, sir," said he with increased emphasis, — "we mean, sir, to put you Abolitionists down — by fair means if we can, by foul means if we must."* Beyond all doubt, this merchant expressed the feelings and the purposes of his class. The virus of slavery at that day poured in a strong tide through every avenue of commerce between the North and the South. Northern men, many of them prominent in the church and liberal contributors to benevolent societies, took security for debts owed them at the South, in the shape of mortgages upon "slaves and souls of men," and, in case of foreclosure, sold the human chattels and put the proceeds in their pockets, with as little fear of censure as they would have experienced in selling so many sheep or swine. In many instances such men occupied the most eligible pews in churches, and frowned upon ministers if they even dared to pray in public for the slaves. In Northern colleges, the whole power of faculties and trustees was exerted to prevent agitation among the students. In some of these colleges were bodies of Southern young men, who stood ready to display the "manners of the plantation" upon such of their fellow-students as dared to whisper a word against the divinity of slavery. Publishers at the North, in reprinting English books, erased from their pages the passages likely to give offence to the traffickers in human flesh. Even the American Tract Society and the Methodist Book Concern engaged in this work of mutilation, and hardly had the grace to be ashamed of it when they were exposed. At the very time when slavery was thus obtruding itself into every Northern interest and relation, demanding of us the meanest of all services in its behalf, we were told that it was none of our business, and that the discussion of the subject was nothing less than treason against the government.

* Mr. May's "Recollections," p. 127.

The spirit of the South at this time is indicated in the following paragraph from "The Richmond Whig," one of the most respectable and influential journals of that section:—

"Let the hell-hounds at the North beware. Let them not feel too much security in their homes, or imagine that they who throw firebrands, although from, as they think, so safe a distance, will be permitted to escape with impunity. There are thousands now animated with a spirit to brave every danger to bring these felons to justice on the soil of the Southern States, whose women and children they have dared to endanger by their hell-concocted plots. We have feared that Southern exasperation would seize some of the prime conspirators in their very beds, and drag them to meet the punishment due their offences. We fear it no longer. We hope it may be so, and our applause as one man shall follow the successful enterprise."

The Columbia (S. C.) "Telescope" uttered itself thus:—

"Let us declare, through the public journals of our country, that the question of slavery is not and shall not be open to discussion—that the very moment any private individual attempts to lecture us upon its evils and immorality, in the same moment his tongue shall be cut out and cast upon the dunghill."

It was not alone the politicians of the South who were meditating schemes of vengeance; the clergy were filled with the same evil spirit.

"Let your emissaries," said the Rev. Thomas S. Witherspoon of Alabama, in a letter to the editor of the "Emancipator," "dare to cross the Potomac, and I cannot promise you that your fate will be less than Haman's. Then beware how you goad an insulted but magnanimous people to deeds of desperation."

"Let them" [the Abolitionists], said the Rev. Wm. S. Plummer, D. D., of Richmond, "understand that they will be caught if they come among us, and they will take good care to keep out of our way. If the Abolitionists will set the country in a blaze, it is but fair that they should receive the first warming of the fire."

"At the approaching stated meeting of the Presbytery," said the Rev. Robert N. Anderson, D. D., writing to the sessions of the Presbyterian churches of Hanover (Va.) Presbytery, "I design to offer a preamble and string of resolutions on the subject of the treasonable and abominably wicked interference of the Northern and Eastern fanatics with our political and civil rights, our property, and our domestic concerns. If there be any stray goat of a minister among you, tainted with the blood-hound principles of abolitionism, let him be ferreted out, silenced, excommunicated, and left to the public to dispose of in other respects."

"If you wish to educate the slaves," said the Rev. J. C. Postell (Methodist) of South Carolina, writing to Rev. La Roy Sunderland of New York, "I will tell you how to raise the money without editing 'Zion's Watchman.' You and old Arthur Tappan come out to the South this winter, and they will raise a hundred thousand dollars for you. New Orleans itself will be pledged for it."

During this same year twenty thousand dollars reward was offered in New Orleans for the seizure of Arthur Tappan, and ten thousand dollars in some other place for that of Rev. Amos A. Phelps. Several other Northern Abolitionists were honored in a similar way, and the fires of persecution burned fiercely. In March, 1835, the Noyes Academy in Canaan, N. H., was opened for the reception of pupils without distinction of color. The whole State was thereby thrown into a fierce commotion. "The New Hampshire Patriot" at Concord, and many other papers, teemed from week to week with the most vulgar attacks upon the school and its managers, until, on the 10th of August, a great body of the inhabitants of Canaan and the neighboring towns assembled together, and, with a team of one hundred yoke of oxen, dragged the school building from its foundations and left it on the highway, a useless ruin. The leader of this mob was a member of the Congregational church in Canaan. The outrage was regarded with cool indifference, if not with approbation, by the great body of citizens in all that region.

At Worcester, Mass., on the same day, the Rev. Orange Scott, a Methodist clergyman of high standing, while delivering an anti-slavery lecture, was assailed by a son of ex-Governor Lincoln, who, with the assistance of an Irishman, tore up his notes and offered him personal violence. Not far from the same time, the Rev. George Storrs, another Methodist clergyman, of the highest character, while delivering a lecture in Northfield, N. H., was arrested on the charge of being "a common rioter and brawler," and sentenced by a magistrate to three months imprisonment in the house of correction. The case was appealed to a higher tribunal, and the sentence was not executed. The man who instigated this proceeding was afterwards a Democratic member of Congress.

The incidents above related were but the beginning of the reign of terror, of which I shall have more to say hereafter. I wish now to notice briefly an effort made in Boston at the beginning of the year (1835) to organize a conservative anti-slavery society, — one that should not displease the slaveholders, nor make any uncomfortable excitement at the North. The most obstinate and virulent of the clerical opponents of abolition were at the head of this scheme; and the purpose frankly avowed by some of them was to "put down Garrison and his friends." A call for a convention was, by a curious oversight, issued at first in terms so broad as fairly to include the Abolitionists, and leave open the question of forming a new society. The blunder was discovered before the convention assembled, and a new call issued, but not in time to prevent the attendance of some leading Abolitionists, who were prepared to discuss the question with their opponents, and to show them that if they were really opposed to slavery and prepared to adopt efficient measures for its overthrow, there was no need whatever of a new organization. If the call had not been changed, the promoters of the scheme would have been sure to be outvoted by clergymen and laymen of their own denominations. The new society was wanted, not as a means of opposing slavery, but only as a feint to deceive the unwary and the unsuspecting, and make an appearance of doing something, while actually doing nothing to any purpose. The name of the society was "The American Union for the Relief and Improvement of the Colored Race;" and the constitution was so worded, as while it was seemingly opposed to slaveholding, it did really permit the cunning apologists of slavery to become members and to control its action. "The system of slavery" was pronounced "wrong," while nothing was said against individual slaveholding. A motion to substitute the word "sinful" for the word "wrong" was most strenuously objected to, on the ground that the object was to "conciliate and unite," and that the word wrong would not be so offensive to gentlemen of the South, and would better accord with the views and feelings of wise men at the North." One of the clergymen present said: "Many of the men on whom we are to operate are not professors of religion, and the word wrong does not sound to them as the word sin does; it is less offensive." Brave reformers these, who were more concerned not to give offence to the slaveholders and their friends than they were on account of the wrongs done to the slaves! The new society, being rooted in nothing but hatred of the Abolitionists and a desire to put down the anti-slavery agitation, soon went to its own place. Its supporters, finding that they could do nothing by its means to accomplish their real purpose, and that the public saw through their thin disguise, abandoned it to its fate. Founded upon no principle of genuine hostility to slavery, it died an ignominious death, while most of its members became even more than ever embittered against the Abolitionists.

In the midst of the persecutions of this period the Abolitionists were cheered by the intelligence that a distinguished slaveholder, Mr. James G. Birney, had espoused their cause, and given freedom to his slaves. He was a native of Kentucky, but for some years had been a distinguished member of the bar at Huntsville, Ala. He had for several years been the agent of the Colonization Society in the Southwestern States. As early as 1832 he met Theodore D. Weld at the house of Rev. Dr. Allen of Huntsville, and in conversing with him was led into a closer examination of the moral character of slavery. The final result was a conviction in his mind of the sinfulness of slaveholding, and of his own duty to emancipate his slaves. He thereupon summoned them all into his presence, acknowledged the wrong that he had done them in holding them in bondage, and announced that he had executed deeds of emancipation for each and all of them, and that henceforth they would be free. He offered to retain them all in his service and to pay them wages, if they should desire to remain with him. The negroes, instead of proceeding at once, as according to the current pro-slavery theory they ought to have done, to cut Mr. Birney's throat and burn his house over his head, gratefully took up the "shovel and the hoe," and went to work for him with right good-will. Naturally enough, Mr. Birney was received with open arms by the Abolitionists. Wherever he was announced to speak crowds flocked to hear him. As Mr. May says: "He was mild yet firm, cautious yet not afraid to speak the whole truth, candid but not compromising, careful not to exaggerate in aught, and equally careful not to concede or extenuate." But the Northern sympathizers with slavery, though they could not charge him with any violence or fanaticism, and though they could not deny that he was a calm, dignified and cultured gentleman and Christian, liked him not a whit better than they did Mr. Garrison. The tide of detraction against the anti-slavery cause was not diminished or softened in the least by his appearance among us. Indeed, he was the object of peculiar hatred, because, having lived in the South from his birth, he was able to throw a flood of light upon the workings of the slave system, and thus to show the folly and absurdity of all the defences made of it by its apologists and supporters.

The American Anti-Slavery Society, soon after its formation, adopted the practice of sending its most important publications — those especially which explained its principles and designs — to leading citizens at the South. This would seem to have been required on the score of principle as well as courtesy. Seeking the abolition of slavery, not by external force, but by appeals to the reason and judgment as well as the conscience of the masters, the Abolitionists desired nothing so much as to have their movements thoroughly understood at the South. They would gladly have sent thither living agents, to meet the holders of slaves, and, if possible, persuade them, not only for their own peace of mind, but as a means of advancing their pecuniary interests, to give freedom to their bondmen.

In the beginning, indeed, it was their hope that the Southern people would shortly become reasonable enough to permit, if not to invite, the presence of such agents. Meanwhile, the least that they could do was to send their publications to men whose names were found in public documents or obtained from private sources. This they did openly, availing themselves of the postal service of the United States. Not one of their documents was ever addressed by them to a slave. To him, indeed, they had nothing to say, save to entreat him never to attempt to redress his wrongs by violence, but to wait patiently for his chains to be broken by "The mild arms of Truth and Love,

Made mighty through the living God."

In the summer of 1835, large quantities of anti-slavery publications were sent through the mails to citizens of the South, from the anti-slavery office in New York. A tremendous excitement in that part of the country was the consequence. If, indeed, the Society had furnished every slave with a bowie-knife, and advised him to cut his master's throat therewith at the earliest possible moment, the rage of the South could hardly have been greater than it was. The documents were pronounced incendiary, and though they were addressed exclusively to white men, and generally to the foremost slaveholders, it was coolly assumed, at the North as well as at the South, that they were intended to excite an insurrection and deluge the South in blood! Fresh torrents of misrepresentation and abuse were thereupon heaped upon the heads of the Abolitionists, whose voices of explanation and protest were drowned in a worse than Niagara roar of calumny. In Charleston, on the 29th of July, the post-office was broken open by a mob, and the anti-slavery publications that had accumulated therein, and which the postmaster had obligingly left in a pile for the convenience of the rioters, were taken out and burned in the presence of an exultant crowd. Shortly afterwards a public meeting was held to denounce the "incendiaries" of the North, and to complete the work of the mob by ferreting out and punishing any Abolitionist, or friend of Abolitionists, who might happen to be in the city. "This meeting," said the "Charleston Courier" in its report, "the clergy of all denominations attended in a body, lending their sanction to the proceedings, and adding by their presence to the impressive character of the scene." John G. Whittier was moved to embalm this impressive scene for the benefit of coming generations, in a poem entitled "Clerical Oppressors," a few stanzas of which are here copied:—

"Just God! and these are they
 Who minister at Thine altar, God of Right!
 Men who their hands, with prayer and blessing, lay
 On Israel's Ark of light!

What! preach and kidnap men?
 Give thanks, and rob Thy own afflicted poor?
 Talk of Thy glorious liberty, and then
 Bolt hard the captive's door?

Pilate and Herod friends!
 Chief priests and rulers, as of old, combine!
 Just God and holy! is that church, which lends Strength to the Spoiler, Thine?

How long, O Lord, how long
 Shall such a priesthood barter truth away,
 And, in Thy name, for robbery and wrong
 At Thy own altars pray?

Woe to the priesthood! woe
 To all whose hire is with the price of blood!
 Perverting, darkening, changing, as they go,
 The searching truths of God!

Their glory and their might Shall perish; and their very names shall be Vile before all the people, in the light
 Of a world's liberty!"

The postmaster at Charleston took the responsibility of refusing to deliver anti-slavery publications until he should receive instructions from Washington. The postmaster-general, Amos Kendall, a man of New England birth, told his subordinate that he had "no legal authority to exclude newspapers from the mail, nor to prohibit their carriage or delivery on account of their character or tendency, real or supposed." Having made this admission, he proceeded to say: "We owe an obligation to the laws, but a higher one to the communities in which we live; and, if the former be permitted to destroy the latter, it is patriotism to disregard them. Entertaining these views, I cannot sanction, and will not condemn the step you have taken." The scoffers at a Higher Law easily discovered a lower one when it was necessary for the accomplishment of their evil designs. Postmasters generally at the South followed the example set them at Charleston, and this action on their part was widely commended at the North.

Shortly after the occurrences above related there were movements for holding great public meetings in the chief cities at the North. And what does the reader suppose was their object? Was it to protest against the outrages at Charleston and elsewhere, and to vindicate the liberty of the press and the sanctity of the mails? On the contrary, it was to apologize, openly or covertly, for those outrages, and to intensify the public hostility against the Abolitionists on account of their lawful and peaceful efforts to abolish slavery. In other words, it was to "PUT THE ABOLITIONISTS DOWN," and thus protect the South from all danger of interference with her system of slavery. New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and some of the smaller cities gave utterance to the prevailing madness. The Abolitionists asked for Faneuil Hall, wherein to explain their objects and defend themselves against the assaults of their enemies. Their request was rudely denied; but on the 15th of August the doors of the "Old Cradle" were opened to their enemies and made to echo with their misrepresentations and calumnies. The mayor took the chair, and the blood of Boston, already at fever heat, was still more inflamed by intemperate harangues from the lips of Harrison Gray Otis, Richard Fletcher and Peleg Sprague. Daniel Webster, for some unexplained reason, was reserved for later immolation upon the bloody altar of slavery. The resolutions adopted were full of the most preposterous assumptions in the interest of slavery, and of the grossest libels upon the Abolitionists. It was not long after this that Mr. Garrison was hung in effigy at his own door, and there seemed only too much reason to fear that his life might fall a prey to the madness of the time. In the midst of all these proceedings, which menaced the overthrow of the freedom of speech and of the press, the destruction of the sanctity of the mails, and the perpetual rule of the Slave Power, the Pulpit of New England was either apologetic or dumb; or, if here and there some minister, braver than his brethren, ventured to remonstrate, his single voice seemed only to emphasize the surrounding silence.

The Faneuil Hall meeting, by intensifying the public hostility to the Abolitionists, led naturally to the Boston mob of "gentlemen of property and standing," on the 21st of October, 1835. As I have stated in a previous chapter, the avowed design of the mob was to do violence to Mr. George Thompson, the eloquent anti-slavery lecturer from England. The annual meeting of the Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society was advertised to be held on that day in the Anti-Slavery Hall, 46 Washington Street. A larger hall had been engaged for the purpose of holding the meeting at an earlier date, but the owners, fearing a mob, declined to open its doors; and, after a week's postponement, the meeting was notified to be held as above. A false report that Mr. Thompson would deliver an address on the occasion added to the public excitement. The morning papers referred to the meeting in terms well calculated to excite a mob. One of them — "The Commercial Gazette" I think it was — said it was "in vain to hold meetings in Faneuil Hall; in vain that speeches are made and resolutions adopted, assuring our brethren of the South that we cherish rational and correct notions on the subject of slavery, if Thompson and Garrison, and their vile associates in this city, are permitted to hold their meetings in the broad face of day, and to continue their denunciations of the planters of the South. They must be put down if we would preserve our consistency. The evil is one of the greatest magnitude; and the opinion prevails very generally that if there is no law that will reach it, it must be reached in some other way." This and other similar articles had their natural results in the gathering of an immense mob — of "gentlemen of property and standing," one of the papers called it — that filled all the streets in the vicinity of the meeting. The anti-slavery women, as they passed into the hall through this crowd of chivalrous friends of the South, were assailed in a rude and indecent fashion. They entered quietly, and went calmly about their business. The president, Miss Mary S. Parker, read a portion of Scripture, and then lifted up a firm but gentle voice in fervent prayer to God for his blessing upon the slave's cause, for the forgiveness of its deluded enemies and persecutors, and for succor and protection to its friends in the hour of peril. She offered thanks that "though there were many to molest, there were none that could make afraid." "It was," says Mr. Garrison, who was present by invitation to address the meeting, "an awful, sublime and soul-thrilling scene — enough, one would suppose, to melt adamant hearts, and make even fiends of darkness stagger and retreat. Indeed, the clear, untremulous voice of that Christian heroine in prayer occasionally awed the ruffians into silence, and was heard distinctly even in the midst of their hisses, yells and curses; for they could not long silently endure the agony of conviction, and their conduct became furious." The Anti-Slavery Office was separated from the hall by a board partition, and to this Mr. Garrison retired, by advice of the President, in company with Mr. C. C. Burleigh, who locked the door to preserve the contents of the Depository from being destroyed. The mayor, who had shown his sympathy with the object which the genteel ruffians had in view by presiding with alacrity at the Faneuil Hall meeting, instead of taking the necessary means to disperse the mob and protect the Society, entered the meeting to command the ladies to retire. Seeing that no efforts of theirs could induce him to do his sworn duty, they adjourned to the house of one of their number, encountering again, as they passed into the street, the jeers and curses of the ruffian crowd. The mob having bravely demolished the anti-slavery sign, which the mayor had ordered to be given up to them, and appropriated the Testaments and prayer-books that had been thrown out of the windows, next turned their attention to Mr. Garrison, whose place of retreat was easily discovered. "We must have Garrison! Out with him! Lynch him!" they cried. By advice of the mayor he attempted to escape at the rear of the building. He got safely from a back window on to a shed, making, however, a narrow escape from falling headlong to the ground. He reached a carpenter's shop, where a friend tried to conceal him, but in vain. The rioters, uttering a yell, furiously dragged him to a window, with the intention of throwing him from that height to the ground. But one of them relented and said, "Don't kill him outright." So they drew him back, and coiled a rope around his body, probably intending to drag him through the streets therewith. He descended to the street by a ladder raised for the purpose. He fortunately extricated himself from the rope, but was seized by two or three of the leading rioters, powerful and athletic men, by whom he was dragged along bareheaded, a friendly voice in the crowd shouting, "He shan't be hurt! he is an American!" This seemed to excite sympathy in some breasts, and they reiterated the same cry. Blows, however, were aimed at his head by such as were of a cruel spirit, and at last they succeeded in tearing nearly all the clothes from his body. Thus was he dragged from Wilson's Lane into State Street, in the rear of the City Hall, over ground that was stained with the blood of the first martyrs in the cause of Liberty and Independence, in the memorable massacre of 1770; and upon which, only a few years before, had been unfurled, with joyous acclamations, the beautiful banner presented by the young men of Boston to the gallant Poles. At the south door of the City Hall the mayor attempted to protect him; but as he was unassisted by any show of authority or force, he was quickly thrust aside. There was a tremendous rush to prevent him from being taken into the hall. For a time the conflict was desperate; but at length a rescue was effected by a posse that came to the help of the mayor, and he was taken up to the mayor's room. Here he was furnished with needful clothing, the mayor and his advisers declaring that the only way to preserve his life was to commit him to jail as a disturber of the peace! Accordingly a hack was got ready at the door, and, supported by Sheriff Parkman and Ebenezer Bailey, Esq. (the mayor leading the way), he was put into the vehicle without much difficulty; the crowd not recognizing him at first in his new garb.

THE BOSTON MOB OF OCTOBER 21, 1835.

“But now,” says Mr. Garrison, “a scene occurred that baffles description. As the ocean, lashed into fury by the spirit of the storm, seeks to whelm the adventurous bark beneath the mountain waves, so did the mob, enraged by a series of disappointments, rush like a whirlwind upon the frail vehicle in which I sat, and endeavor to drag me out of it. Escape seemed a physical impossibility. They clung to the wheels, dashed open the doors, seized hold of the horses, and tried to upset the carriage. They were, however, vigorously repulsed by the police—a constable sprung in by my side—the doors were closed—and the driver, lustily using his whip upon the bodies of his horses and the heads of the rioters, happily made an opening through the crowd, and drove at a tremendous speed for Leverett Street. But many of the rioters followed even with superior swiftness, and repeatedly attempted to arrest the progress of the horses. To reach the jail by a direct course was found impracticable; and after going by a circuitous direction, and encountering many hair-breadth escapes, we drove up to the new and last refuge of liberty and life, when another desperate attempt was made by the mob to seize me, but in vain. In a few moments I was locked up in a cell, safe from my persecutors, accompanied by two delightful associates—a good conscience and a cheerful mind. In the course of the evening several of my friends came to my grated window, to sympathize and confer with me, with whom I held a strengthening conversation until the hour of retirement, when I threw myself upon my prison-bed, and slept tranquilly.”

In the morning the prisoner inscribed upon the walls of his cell, with a pencil, the following lines:—

“William Lloyd Garrison was put into this cell on Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 21, 1835, to save him from the violence of a ‘respectable’ and influential mob, who sought to destroy him for preaching the abominable and dangerous doctrine that 'all men are created equal,' and that all oppression is odious in the sight of God. 'Hail Columbia!' Cheers for the Autocrat of Russia, and the Sultan of Turkey!

"Reader, let this inscription remain till the last slave in this despotic land be loosed from his fetters.

"When peace within the bosom reigns,
And conscience gives the approving voice,
Though bound the human form in chains,
Yet can the soul aloud rejoice.

"'Tis true my footsteps are confined—
I cannot range beyond this cell;
But what can circumscribe my mind?
To chain the winds attempt as well!

"Confine me as a prisoner — but bind me not as a slave.
Punish me as a criminal — but hold me not as a chattel.
Torture me as a man — but drive me not like a beast.
Doubt my sanity — but acknowledge my immortality."

"In the course of the forenoon," says Mr. Garrison, "after passing through the mockery of an examination, for form's sake, before Judge Whitman, I was released from prison; but at the earnest solicitation of the city authorities, in order to tranquillize the public mind, I deemed it proper to leave the city for a few days, accompanied by my wife, whose situation was such as to awaken the strongest solicitude for her life."

Those who imagine, as too many ill-informed persons do, that the anti-slavery movement began with the organization of the Liberty, the Freesoil, or the Republican party, are the victims of a great mistake. They little know by what toils and sacrifices a highway for those parties was cast up by men and women who trod the field with bleeding feet, and stood firmly for the right in the presence of such fiery trials as beset only the paths that martyrs are called to tread. If the Abolitionists at this earlier period had given way before the minions of the slave power, the Liberty party could not have been born for a century, if indeed the republic could in that case have been saved from destruction. Dr. Channing, though critical of some of their modes of action, gave them unqualified praise for their brave defence of the freedom of speech. "To them," he said, "has been committed the most important bulwark of liberty, and they have acquitted themselves of the trust like men and Christians. Of such men I do not hesitate to say, that they have rendered to freedom a more essential service than any body of men among us. The defenders of freedom are not those who claim and exercise rights which no one assails, or who win shouts of applause by well-turned compliments to liberty in the days of her triumph. They are those who stand up for rights which mobs, conspiracies, or single tyrants put in jeopardy; who contend for liberty in that particular form which is threatened at the moment by the many or the few. To the Abolitionists this honor belongs. From my heart I thank them. I am myself their debtor. I am not sure that I should this moment (Nov. 4, 1836,) write in safety, had they shrunk from the conflict, had they shut their lips, imposed silence on their presses, and hid themselves before their ferocious assailants. I thank the Abolitionists that in this evil day they were true to the rights which the multitude were ready to betray. Their purpose to suffer, to die, rather than surrender their dearest liberties, taught the lawless that they had a foe to contend with whom it was not safe to press."* This tribute, be it remembered, was written almost twenty years before the organization of the Republican party, and before the Liberty party was conceived. I would not detract in the least from the praise due to the noble men who fought the Slave

* Channing's Works in six volumes — Vol. II., pp. 159, 160.

Power by means of a political party, on the floor of Congress and elsewhere, without flinching, hampered as they were by the compromises of a blood-stained Constitution; but I would have them remember that the cause met its Thermopylæ before any anti-slavery political party was born, and that whatever was done through the ballot-box was accomplished by the aid of moral forces previously accumulated, and that alone made such a political party possible.

XII.

Effects of the Boston Mob — Francis Jackson's Bravery — Harriet Martineau — Mrs. Chapman and her Work — Mobs in Montpelier, Vt., and Utica, N. Y. — Gerrit Smith — Alvan Stewart — Burning of Pennsylvania Hall — Attempts to Put the Abolitionists Down by Law — Demands of the South — Gov. Everett — Prosecution of Dr. Crandall — Flogging of Amos Dresser — Requisition from the Governor of Alabama — Harsh Language.

THE "gentlemen of property and standing" in Boston were not long in discovering that the weapons which they had formed for the suppression of the anti-slavery agitation did not prosper. One of the first effects of the riot was seen in the bravery of Francis Jackson, who, while Mr. Garrison was in jail and the rioters were yet patrolling the city and exulting that they had "put the Abolitionists down," sent a letter to the President of the Female Anti-Slavery Society, offering his dwelling for its use whenever it should desire to hold another meeting. This brave act thrilled the hearts of the Abolitionists and awed their enemies. How brightly "shines a good deed in a naughty world!" The invitation was accepted, and on the 19th of November a memorable meeting was held in Mr. Jackson's house. It was a solemn occasion, for those present were not sure that the house would not be sacked or burned. Harriet Martineau was then in Boston. She had travelled extensively in the country, at the South as well as at the North. Conservative Unitarians and others had done their utmost to prejudice her against American Abolitionists; but she deemed it her duty, in view of the persecutions to which they were subjected, to attend this meeting, and see for herself whether the aspersions cast upon them were just. Being invited to address the meeting, she responded promptly. "I had supposed," she said, "that my presence here would be understood as showing my sympathy with you. But as I am requested to speak, I will say what I have said through the whole South, in every family where I have been, that I consider slavery inconsistent with the law of God, and incompatible with the course of his providence. I should certainly say no less at the North than at the South concerning this utter abomination, and now I declare that in your principles I fully agree." This brave, yet modest little speech brought upon Miss Martineau a tide of denunciation only less violent than that which had beat for months on the head of her noble countryman, George Thompson. Up to that moment her society had been courted by the élite of Boston, especially by the Unitarians, with whom she was religiously associated. But now she was slighted as one who had committed an unpardonable offence. Her brave words were imbued with power, and while they greatly cheered and encouraged the Abolitionists, they filled the pro-slavery party with rage. Her experience at this time prepared her to write that admirable little work, "The Martyr Age of America," which did so much to bind the hearts of Abolitionists in England to the struggling friends of the cause in the United States. From that day to the end of our conflict her powerful pen was always at the service of the cause; and I doubt if any other person ever did so much as she to give the people of Great Britain a clear understanding of the nature of our struggle, of the mighty obstacles it encountered, and of the ways in which they could help us.

Ten righteous men, it is said, would have availed to save the ancient city of Sodom. Boston was spared for one ; but that one was in himself a host, and able to put ten thousand enemies of freedom to flight. Ever afterwards, to the day of his death, which occurred during the war of Rebellion, Mr. Jackson was foremost in the anti-slavery conflict. He served for many years as President of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, presiding at its meetings with a dignity that commanded the public respect ; his house was ever open to the faithful workers in the cause, and to shelter the fugitive slave ; and he gave generously of his substance for the support of lecturers and the printing and distribution of anti-slavery periodicals and tracts. Modest and unobtrusive in manner, he was firm as a rock in his adherence to the cause, quick to discern, and prompt to repel danger, and brave enough to endure without flinching and without complaint the reproaches heaped upon his head by the minions of slavery. His name in Boston, where he was conspicuous for integrity in public affairs as well as in private life, was a tower of strength.

Another name, that of a woman, was brought into wide conspicuity amidst the events above related. Maria Weston Chapman, the wife of Mr. Henry G. Chapman, a Boston merchant, and for many years the treasurer of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, was the pride and charm of the most cultured social circle in Boston. She had enjoyed some of the best opportunities of culture which Europe offered to an ambitious American girl, and encountered the temptations to a worldly and fashionable life to which so many others yielded. Possessing in an eminent degree the graces of person, the intellectual acquirements and the wit that are so fascinating in womanhood, she yet consecrated herself and her great gifts to the service of a righteous but most unpopular cause. She was a member of the Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society before the mob, and a close observer of the events of that trying period; and not long afterwards she gave to the world a most remarkable brochure, entitled "RIGHT AND WRONG IN BOSTON," in which the conspirators against Liberty were depicted in their true character and held up to the scorn of mankind for all coming time. She was the cotemporary historian of Boston's mob of "gentlemen of property and standing," and the leading actors therein cowered under the well-deserved strokes of her lash. Her pamphlet is of great historic value. It will forever bring a blush of shame to the cheeks of some whose misfortune it will be to trace their line of ancestry through that stormy period. But such are the revenges of Time.

From this period to the close of the conflict Mrs. Chapman occupied a position of great usefulness and power. Her counsel in emergencies was invaluable. She was quick to detect and expose any sign of treachery to the cause, and any attempt to lower the standard to meet the requirements of intriguing and selfish men. Her executive power was remarkable. She could keep more irons in the fire, without burning one of them, than any person I ever knew. For many successive years she was an inspiring force in the cause, laying out plans of labor on the widest fields, and superintending their execution with unsleeping vigilance. Her pen, keen as a Damascus blade, was like a lance in rest, ready on the instant for any required service. During many years a very large proportion of the funds used in carrying on the cause were raised by means of an annual fair in Boston. Of this fair Mrs. Chapman and her three sisters (Miss Anne Warren, Miss Caroline, and Miss Deborah Weston) were the chief managers. The most beautiful articles for the fair were contributed by the faithful friends of the cause in Great Britain and France, with whom Mrs. Chapman was in constant correspondence, and who are entitled to the eternal gratitude of the American people for the help they gave us in our struggle to abolish slavery. I might mention the names of some of these foreign helpers, but I fear that in doing so I might seem to be invidious in omitting others equally worthy of recognition. In connection with the fair, and as a special means of advancing the cause, Mrs. Chapman published a beautiful little annual, "THE LIBERTY BELL," which she edited with rare skill and taste. The volumes, a dozen or more in number, are worthy of preservation as memorials of the cause and specimens of the literature it produced. In them will be found contributions from a large number of the most prominent anti-slavery writers of the time, both men and women.

In a jeu d'esprit, by James Russell Lowell, published many years ago, and embracing a description of prominent persons attending one of the annual fairs in Boston, I find these lines:—

"There was Maria Chapman, too,
 With her swift eyes of clear steel blue,
 The coiled-up mainspring of the Fair,
 Originating everywhere
 The expansive force, without a sound,
 That whirls a hundred wheels around;
 Herself meanwhile as calm and still
 As the bare crown of Prospect Hill;
 A noble woman, brave and apt,
 Cumæa's sybil not more rapt,
 Who might, with those fair tresses shorn,
 The Maid of Orleans' casque have worn;
 Herself the Joan of our Arc,
 For every shaft a shining mark."

The 21st of October, 1835, is memorable, not alone for the Boston riot, but for two other similar attempts to put the Abolitionists down by violence. One of these took place at Montpelier, the capital of Vermont, and in the very church where, a little more than three years before, I had delivered my first anti-slavery lecture. Samuel J. May, who, on account of his gentleness of speech, was called our Apostle John, was the speaker of the occasion. No sooner did he begin his address than a mob, led by some of the foremost citizens of the place, commanded him to be silent, and the meeting was broken up. For the state of public sentiment which made this and other similar riots possible in that State, no other newspaper was so much responsible as the "Vermont Chronicle," which, from the very beginning of the anti-slavery movement, had persistently misrepresented its principles and designs, and done what it could to make its champions odious. It was the organ of the Congregationalists, the most numerous and influential sect in the State, and hence its power for mischief was very great. It was for this reason that Vermont was so long tolerant of the designs of the Slave Power. Nothing could be more offensive to a pure conscience than the hair-splitting, Bible-perverting metaphysics by means of which the brothers Tracy prevented the churches of Vermont from taking their true position as the uncompromising opponents of the slave system. The moral atmosphere of the State is even now not quite disinfected of the taint derived from that source.

But there was a far more formidable riot on the same day, in Utica, N. Y., where a convention to form a State Anti-Slavery Society was to meet. A worse than Ephesian uproar ensued. Leading citizens declared that the convention must be broken up; Utica must not be disgraced by an assembly of "fanatics and incendiaries." The court-house having been engaged for the convention, a public meeting of the pro-slavery party was held in advance, and arrangements were made to pre-occupy the building before the hour at which the Abolitionists were to assemble, and by any means to prevent them from effecting their object.

The whole city was in an uproar, and the disturbance was led by eminent citizens. The convention, composed of from six to eight hundred delegates, was driven from the court-house to the Second Presbyterian Church, where it barely succeeded in organizing the proposed society before it was broken up. The chief of the mob was the Hon. Samuel Beardsley, then a representative of the district in Congress, who declared that "the disgrace of having an Abolition Convention held in the city would be a deeper one than that of twenty mobs," and "that it would be better to have Utica razed to its foundations, or to have it destroyed like Sodom and Gomorrah, than to have the Convention meet here."

Up to this time, Gerrit Smith, though an earnest opponent of slavery, had adhered to the Colonization Society and kept aloof from the anti-slavery cause. He came to the Utica Convention to be a spectator of its proceedings, and to inform himself more fully of the designs and purposes of the Abolitionists. He was so disgusted, shocked and alarmed by the action of the pro-slavery party, and so impressed by the earnestness, devotion and patience of the members of the Convention, that he felt the hour had come for him to take his stand openly with the friends of immediate emancipation. He invited all the members of the Convention to repair to Peterboro, his place of residence, thirty miles distant, and finish their proceedings. A large proportion of the members accepted the invitation, and on the next day they assembled in the Presbyterian church of Peterboro, where Mr. Smith made an address of surpassing eloquence and power, in which he avowed his purpose from that time forth to act with the Abolitionists. The accession to our ranks of a man of such high social and moral distinction filled us with encouragement and hope, and helped us to bear patiently the persecution that still remained for us. Ever afterwards his name was a tower of strength for the cause. His pen, his voice, his purse were always at its service. His house was a refuge for the fugitive slave and for the toil-worn lecturer, and of his great wealth he contributed generously to the promotion of every form of anti-slavery effort.

It did not require a mob to make an Abolitionist of that eminent advocate, Alvan Stewart. With his clear head, his warm love of liberty, and his keen sense of the wrong of turning a man into a chattel, he could be nothing else. But while the mob was not needful to his conversion, it did rouse him to put forth his great energies in behalf of the cause. His commanding eloquence as a speaker, his quick perception of the ludicrous, his power of sarcasm and ridicule, combined with his high moral tone, his indignation at every form of injustice, and his imperturbable good-nature, made him a powerful champion of our struggling enterprise. He died in the very maturity of his powers, revered and lamented by all who could appreciate his sterling worth. He was more especially interested in the political aspects of the slavery question, and if he had lived he would no doubt have taken a high place in that group of great men whose services in the cause of freedom form so large a part of the history of the last twenty-five years. It will be a misfortune if a personage so unique, and whose life exhibited such varied powers, should fail to find a biographer.

On the 17th of May, 1838, Pennsylvania Hall, a commodious structure erected by the friends of freedom in Philadelphia, at a cost of $40,000, and consecrated to the free discussion of all subjects interesting to American citizens, was burned by a mob three days only after its dedication. During those three days the hall was used for meetings to promote education and temperance, and to awaken sympathy for the Indians and the slaves. The pro-slavery party was greatly excited by the fact that at last there was a hall in the city which would be open to Abolitionists in common with others; and a mobocratic spirit was roused. The anti-slavery meetings had been addressed by Charles C. Burleigh, Arnold Buffum, Alvan Stewart, William Lloyd Garrison, Angelina Grimké Weld, Maria Weston Chapman and Abby Kelley. The building was surrounded and menaced by a mob. The city authorities took no efficient steps to prevent a riot. The mayor informed the proprietors that if they would hold no meeting on the evening of the 17th, but place the building in his hands, he would disperse the mob. But the rioters did not prove as tractable as he expected. In spite of his feeble and inadequate efforts to protect the building, it was burned to the ground under his very eyes. The conflagration was no doubt regarded with pleasure by a very large proportion of the inhabitants of the city, including not a few men of wealth and high social standing. In short, the public sentiment of the city afforded no protection against such outrages. The burning of the hall was followed during the next two days by brutal attacks upon the colored people, their churches, institutions and private dwellings. The "Shelter for Colored Orphans" was set on fire, and colored people were attacked while passing quietly in the streets. During all of these outrages the conduct of the mayor was most disgraceful.

The mobs of which I have given an account may be taken as samples of a great number of similar disturbances which occurred about the same time in different parts of the country, and which I have not room even to mention. The whole land was hot with pro-slavery wrath, ready at any moment to break out in riotous demonstrations. There was, in fact, an epidemic of mobs, which, if not directly instigated by men of respectable standing in society, were at least winked at by such men as well as by the press. The announcement, almost anywhere, of an anti-slavery lecture was pretty sure to evoke a disturbance. This state of things, in some portions of the country, continued to a greater or less extent from 1834 to 1838, and did not wholly cease even then.

But not by mobs alone was the attempt made to suppress the anti-slavery agitation. From the very beginning there were mutterings of a design on the part of the slaveholders and their Northern allies to effect this object by law — by common law, where the courts were sufficiently compliant, and elsewhere by statutory enactments. The demands for such laws on the part of the Southern press were alike frequent and insolent; and they were sometimes echoed at the North. As early as March, 1832, Judge Peter Thatcher of the Boston Municipal Court, in a charge to the Grand Jury, pronounced it "an undoubted misdemeanor, and indictable as such at common law," to publish in one State with the intent to send it to another, a paper designed to excite slaves to murder their masters; it being always taken for granted that such was the object of the anti-slavery papers. "If any publications," said the Judge, "which have a direct tendency to excite the slave population of other States to rise upon their masters, and to involve their families and property in a common destruction, are here published and circulated freely, may not the citizens of those States well imagine that such publications are authorized by our laws? If such publications were justified and encouraged here, it would tend to alienate from each other the minds of those whose best political happiness and safety consist in preserving in its full strength the bond of the Union." The argument of the Judge was drawn out at length, and not only published promptly in the Boston newspapers, but in the "American Jurist," a periodical of high repute in the legal profession. It was itself as infamous a libel upon a body of peaceable, orderly citizens as was ever published; and, in the then state of the public feeling toward Abolitionists, was a thousand-fold more likely than "The Liberator" to incite men to commit murder.

It was not far from the same time that "The Boston Courier" (Joseph T. Buckingham, editor), which had been distinguished above other journals in that city for its zeal for freedom of the press, came out unequivocally in favor of enacting statute laws for the suppression of "The Liberator." "The people of New England," said the editor, "would stop this publication with as much zeal as the citizens of Charleston."

Another Massachusetts man, the Hon. William Sullivan, wrote a pamphlet in 1835, in which the same doctrine was put forth. "It is to be hoped and expected," he said, "that Massachusetts will enact laws declaring the printing, publishing and circulating of papers and pamphlets on slavery, and also the holding of meetings to discuss slavery and abolition, to be public indictable offences, and provide for the punishment thereof in such manner as will more effectually prevent such offences."

Symptoms like these of a readiness on the part of the North to put the Abolitionists down by law naturally encouraged the South to demand legislation for that purpose. Gov. McDuffie, in his message to the Legislature of South Carolina, after declaring slavery to be "the corner-stone of the Republican edifice," and that the laboring population of any community, "bleached or unbleached," is a "dangerous element in the body politic," and after predicting that the laboring people of the North would be virtually reduced to slavery within twenty-five years, declared that "the laws of every community should punish such interference," as that of the Abolitionists with slavery, "with death without benefit of clergy." The Legislature, responding to the Governor's recommendation, promptly resolved, "That the Legislature of South Carolina, having every confidence in the justice and friendship of the non-slaveholding States, announces her confident expectation, and she earnestly requests, that the government of these States will promptly and effectually suppress all those associations within their respective limits purporting to be abolition societies." The Legislatures of North Carolina, Alabama and Virginia adopted resolutions of the same character. These demands were sent in due form to the governors of the non-slaveholding States. In what spirit were they received? I have not been able to find a single instance in which they awakened the least degree of surprise or indignation, or called forth such a rebuke as they deserved. My impression is that most of the Northern governors contented themselves with a formal and perfunctory transmission of them, without comment, to their respective Legislatures. Not so, however, the governor (W. L. Marcy) of New York, who took occasion to say that, "without the power to pass such laws" as the South demanded "the States would not possess all the necessary means for preserving their external relations of peace among themselves." Whatever measure of individual popularity Governor Marcy may have gained at the South by this slavish utterance, he did not succeed in persuading the Legislature of the Empire State to enact the proposed laws. The people in those days were less servile than their political leaders. In the Legislature of Rhode Island, even before the Southern demands were received, a bill in conformity to those demands was actually presented by a committee to which the subject had been referred. It was defeated by the strenuous efforts of Mr. George Curtis (father of George William Curtis) and Mr. Thomas W. Dorr.

Edward Everett was at that time Governor of Massachusetts. In 1826 he had revealed his servility by declaring on the floor of Congress that "there was no cause in which he would sooner buckle a knapsack to his back and put a musket on his shoulder than that of putting down a servile insurrection at the South." "The great relation of servitude," he added, "in some form or other, with greater or less departure from the theoretic equality of men, is inseparable from our nature. Domestic slavery is not, in my judgment, to be set down as an immoral and irreligious relation. It is a condition of life as well as any other to be justified by morality, religion and international law." Mr. Everett having been trained for the pulpit, these utterances surprised and shocked some people who had not quite unlearned the teaching of an earlier day in respect to slavery. Mr. C. C. Cambreling, a member of Congress from New York, and a native of South Carolina, sharply rebuked the recreant New Englander on the spot. If he (Mr. Everett) had learned such sentiments in the University of Gottingen, he should, said Mr. Cambreling, instead of returning to his native land, have journeyed eastward, "followed the course of the dark-rolling Danube, crossed the Euxine, laid his head upon the footstool of the Sultan, and besought him to place his feet upon the neck of the recreant citizen of a recreant republic." We need not wonder that a man of such antecedents, occupying the post of Governor of Massachusetts, insulted the people of that Commonwealth in his response to the demands of his Southern masters. "Whatever by direct and necessary operation," said this smooth-faced champion of slavery, "is calculated to excite an insurrection among the slaves, has been held, by highly respectable legal authority, an offence against the people of the Commonwealth, which may be prosecuted as a misdemeanor at common law." "The patriotism of all classes," he added, "must be invoked to abstain from a discussion which, by exasperating the master can have no other effect than to render more oppressive the condition of the slave; and which, if not abandoned, there is great reason to fear, will prove the rock on which the Union will split." In other words, the South would consent to remain in the Union only upon the condition that Northern freemen should wear a padlock upon their lips!

This portion of the Governor's message, together with the insolent resolves of the Southern Legislatures, was referred to a joint committee of the two Houses, of which Senator George Lunt of Newburyport, a doughtface of the first water, was chairman; and there was only too much reason to fear that in the then state of public sentiment, Massachusetts might be disgraced by some sort of compliance with the Southern demands. Neither press nor pulpit had the least appreciation of the crisis, and it depended alone upon the Abolitionists to make such resistance as they could to this effort to destroy the sacred right of free discussion. Mr. Garrison and his friends promptly bestirred themselves, and the scheme was defeated. The conduct of the chairman of the committee toward Dr. Follen, William Goodell, and others, who appeared before them to explain and defend the Abolitionists, was so arbitrary and insolent as to excite general indignation.

Mr. Lunt, in behalf of the committee, made a report, in which he spoke of the demands of the South as "of the most solemn and affecting character; as appeals to our justice as men, to our sympathies as brethren, to our patriotism as citizens; to the memory of the common trials and perils of our ancestors and theirs ; to all the better emotions of our nature ; to our respect for the Constitution ; to our regard for the laws ; to our hope for the security of all those blessings which the Union and the Union only can preserve to us." The conduct of the Abolitionists was pronounced "not only wrong in policy, but erroneous in morals," and such as to justify the censures that the Southern Legislatures had bestowed upon them. And yet Mr. Lunt did not venture to propose a compliance with the Southern demand for penal enactments ; his courage was only equal to the presentation of resolutions expressing "entire disapprobation of the doctrines avowed and the general measures pursued by such as agitate the general question of slavery." But even this vicious little mouse, which the Committee had brought forth with so much and such painful labor, was laid on the table, whence it fell into that bottomless limbo reserved for things evil. The country members, though not Abolitionists, had too much common-sense to follow the advice of the Committee.

No person known to be an Abolitionist could travel in those days at the South except at the peril of his life. If any one was suspected, in view of circumstances ever so slight, to be an enemy of slavery, he was sure to meet with some indignity. Meanwhile Southerners could travel at the North, bring their slaves with them, go where they listed, and denounce Abolitionists as incendiaries and cut-throats at every step, and no one thought of imposing any restriction upon their liberty ! It was an offence against public opinion to oppose slavery, but none whatever to apologize for it or defend it outright. Dr. Reuben Crandall (a brother of Prudence Crandall, the founder of the Canterbury school for colored girls), a gentleman of the highest character, went to Washington to teach botany. On the 11th of August, 1835, he was arrested and thrown into jail, on the charge of circulating incendiary publications, with a view to excite an insurrection of slaves. The evidence against him was, that some of his botanical specimens were wrapped in old copies of anti-slavery papers, which had probably been bought in the market as waste paper, and that he had lent an anti-slavery pamphlet to a white citizen. The passages read in court from these publications were no more inflammatory than many that may be found in the writings of Jefferson and Patrick Henry. The prosecuting attorney, however, made a desperate effort to secure his conviction, though without success. But his close confinement for a long time in a damp dungeon brought upon him a lingering consumption, which terminated his life in 1838.

Amos Dresser, a young theological student (a native of Berkshire County, Mass.), went to Nashville, Tenn., in the summer of 1835, to sell the "Cottage Bible." His crime was that he was a member of an anti-slavery society, and that he had some anti-slavery tracts in his trunk: For this he was flogged in the public square of the city, under the direction of a Vigilance Committee, composed of the most distinguished citizens, some of them prominent members of churches. He received twenty lashes on the bare back from a cowskin. On the previous Sunday he had received the bread and wine of the communion from the hands of one of the members of that Vigilance Committee! Another member of the Committee was a prominent Methodist, whose house was the resort of the preachers and bishops of his denomination.

In the latter part of 1835, Governor Gayle, of Alabama, demanded of the Governor of New York that Ransom G. Williams, publishing agent of the American Anti-Slavery Society, should be delivered up for trial under the laws of Alabama (a State in which he had never set his foot), on an indictment found against him for publishing in "The Emancipator," of New York, these two sentences:—

"God commands, and all nature cries out, that men should not be held as property. The system of making men property has plunged 2,250,000 of our fellow-countrymen into the deepest physical and moral degradation, and they are every moment sinking deeper."

The land was ringing with the charge that the Abolitionists were incendiaries, and engaged in stirring up an insurrection of slaves; but the Grand Jury of Tuscaloosa, with something less than a cart-load of anti-slavery publications before it, cited the above sentences as the worst, the most incendiary that they could find. Read them again, and see how false and hollow was the pretence that the Abolitionists brought themselves into difficulty by a reckless use of harsh language! It was the doctrine of the Abolitionists—the doctrine that slavery was a sin against God and an outrage upon humanity, and that immediate emancipation was therefore a duty—and not the language in which that doctrine was presented, that filled the South with madness. Dr. Channing and others thought they could express their hostility to slavery in terms so gentle and a spirit so calm, that the South would welcome their soft rebukes; but they found their mistake, and that the slaveholders, in their wrath, made no discrimination in their favor. Dr. Channing, though he criticised the Abolitionists sharply, was just as intensely hated at the South as Garrison himself, and the recipient of the same odious epithets that were hurled at him.

XIII.

Persecution of James G. Birney — Press Destroyed — The Martyrdom of Lovejoy — Meeting in Faneuil Hall — Dr. Channing — Wendell Phillips — Edmund Quincy.

I HAVE already alluded to Mr. James G. Birney's conversion to the anti-slavery cause, to his emancipation of his slaves, and to his consecration of himself to the work of freedom. The Abolitionists built large hopes upon the accession of such a man to their ranks. They argued therefrom the feasibility of their efforts to convince slaveholders of the sinfulness of slavery and persuade them to break the chains of their slaves; and they felt sure that his example and eloquence would have great weight at the North. They soon discovered, however, the truth of the prophet's words: "Truth faileth, and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey." The South broke out upon Mr. Birney in a storm of wrath. His gentleness, candor, and freedom from exaggeration counted for nothing. Allied by birth and marriage to a large circle of slaveholders, his name was at once cast out by them as evil, and he could find no rest for the sole of his foot in the State where he was born. The Supreme Court of Alabama made haste to expunge his name from the roll of attorneys entitled to practice at the bar; and in the University of the State, of which he had been a trustee, several literary societies, which had elected him an honorary member, passed resolutions of expulsion. In the face of all these angry ebullitions he was not dismayed. He resolved to establish a paper at Danville, Ky., and make open war upon the slave system. On the 12th of July, 1835, the slaveholders of that place and its neighborhood held a public meeting and openly declared that the establishment of the proposed paper should be prevented, by violence if necessary. Mr. Birney thereupon determined to go to Cincinnati; but he soon found that he could not safely set up his press there. He went to New Richmond, twenty miles above Cincinnati, on the Ohio, where Quaker influences were dominant, and from that place appeared the first numbers of "The Philanthropist."

The new paper was well received, and Mr. Birney ere long ventured to remove it to Cincinnati. It had been published there only about three months, when at midnight, on the 12th of July, 1836, the office was visited by a mob which did much damage to the press and types. Handbills appeared on the streets, offering rewards for the arrest of Mr. Birney and his delivery in Kentucky as a fugitive from justice. On the 21st of July a public meeting was held, to see if the people of Cincinnati "will permit the publication or distribution of abolition papers in this city." The postmaster of the city, a clergyman, presided. A committee of thirteen men of wealth and high social position, eight of them communicants in Christian churches, was appointed to wait upon Mr. Birney and his associates and warn them that if the obnoxious paper were not discontinued, the meeting would not be responsible for the consequences. At the head of this committee was Jacob Burnet, an ex-Senator of the United States, and ex-Judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio. The committee met Mr. Birney and the Executive Committee of the Ohio Anti-Slavery Society, in a spirit of insolence worthy of the object it had in view. It would listen to no fair proposal on the part of the Abolitionists. Judge Burnet declared that if the paper were not promptly suppressed, "a mob unusual in numbers, determined in purpose and desolating in its ravages," would be the consequence. Five thousand persons, he predicted, would engage in such a mob, and two-thirds of the property-holders of the city would join it. Mr. Birney and his friends felt that they could not yield to the demands of the committee without betraying a sacred trust and inflicting upon themselves an indelible disgrace. They must remain firm, at whatever hazard to their persons or their property. The threatened mob followed promptly. On the evening of August 1st, the rioters assembled, organized, and resolved to destroy the press and types of "The Philanthropist," and to warn the editor to leave the city within twenty-four hours. Under cover of darkness the office was pillaged, the types were thrown into the street, and the press was broken in pieces and thrown into the river. Mr. Birney, not long after these events, was appointed Secretary of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and "The Philanthropist" passed under the control of Dr. Gamaliel Bailey. Twice after this, however, its types and press were demolished; but ultimately the right of free speech was respected in Cincinnati. Mr. Birney served as Secretary of the National Society till the division of 1840, when he was nominated by the Liberty party as a candidate for President of the United States.

The tragic story of Elijah P. Lovejoy must next be told. He was a native of Maine and a graduate of Waterville College, in the class of 1826. He settled in St. Louis as a teacher, and for a time edited a political paper. In 1832 he resolved to enter the ministry, and after passing some time in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. Returning to St. Louis, he became the editor of a religious paper called "The Observer." He was not an Abolitionist in the full sense of the word, but was a friend of free discussion, and some of his remarks on the subject of slavery gave great offence to the people of St. Louis. He was called to account for this exercise of his freedom in a slaveholding community, but did not prove tractable. In response to those who sought to curb him into silence he reminded them that the blood in his veins was kindred to that which flowed at Lexington and Bunker Hill, and declared that his own should flow like water before he would surrender the right of free discussion. In the spring of 1836, a negro who had killed an officer to avoid arrest, was taken out of jail by a mob, chained to a tree and burned to death. An attempt being made to punish the murderers, the judge (appropriately named Lawless), in his charge to the Grand Jury, laid down the doctrine that when a mob is hurried by some "mysterious, metaphysical and almost electric frenzy" to commit a deed of violence and blood, the participators therein are absolved from guilt and are not proper subjects of punishment. If the jury should find that such was the fact in that case, then, he said, "act not at all in the matter; the case transcends your jurisdiction; it is beyond the reach of human law." Mr. Lovejoy commented upon this infamous charge, and upon the crime it was intended to screen from punishment, in the spirit of a freeman; and for this his office was destroyed by a mob. He determined to remove his paper to Alton, but his press, on being landed there, was at once broken into fragments. The citizens reimbursed him for his loss. The pro-slavery party in Alton soon found occasion of offence, and in the month of August, 1837, the office and press were destroyed by a mob. Another press was purchased, but before it could be set up it also was broken in pieces and the fragments thrown into the Mississippi.

In the midst of these events a convention to form a State Anti-Slavery Society, which had been called to meet at Upper Alton, was broken up by a pro-slavery assemblage. Two days later, however, the convention met in a private house and organized the contemplated society. Among the resolutions adopted was one declaring that "the cause of human rights, the liberty of speech and of the press, imperatively demand that the press of 'The Alton Observer' be re-established at Alton with its present editor," and pledging the Society, with the aid of Alton friends and "by the help of Almighty God;" to take measures for its re-establishment. Among those who took an active part in this convention, was the Rev. Dr. Edward Beecher, President of Illinois College, who drew up the preamble to the Constitution of the Society, and also a bold and comprehensive declaration of sentiments. The town was in a fearful state of excitement. A colonization meeting was held Oct. 31st, in which speeches, calculated if not designed to inflame the mobocratic spirit, were made. Prominent among the speakers was the Rev. Dr. Joel Parker, who, having in 1833 declared himself in favor of immediate emancipation, afterwards went to New Orleans to adapt the Gospel to the tastes and desires of the traffickers in human flesh. A fit person was he to appear on the scene at Alton, in this fearful crisis, to lend a stimulus to the mob that was so soon to imbrue its hands in the blood of Lovejoy.

At a public meeting, held Nov. 3d, to consider whether the publication of "The Observer" should be any longer permitted, Mr. Lovejoy made an eloquent and powerful speech. "I am impelled," he said, "to the course I have taken because I fear God. As I shall answer to my God in the great day, I dare not abandon my sentiments, or cease in all proper ways to propagate them. I am fully aware of all the sacrifice I make in here pledging myself to continue the contest to the last. I am commanded to forsake father and mother, wife and children, for Jesus' sake; and as His professed disciple, I stand pledged to do it. The time for fulfilling this pledge in my case, it seems to me, has come. Sir, I dare not flee away from Alton. Should I attempt it, I should feel that the angel of the Lord, with drawn sword, was pursuing me wherever I went. It is because I fear God that I am not afraid of all those who oppose me in this city. No, sir, the contest has come here, and here it must be finished. Before God and you all, I here pledge myself to continue it, if need be, till death; and if I fall, my grave shall be made in Alton."

This speech made a powerful impression, and for a moment it seemed possible if not probable that the mob might be foiled. Dr. Edward Beecher says he was never before so overcome with the powers of intellect and eloquence. "Many a hard face," he says, "did I see wet with tears as Mr. Lovejoy struck the chords of feeling to which God made the soul to respond. Even his bitter enemies wept. It reminded me of Paul before Festus, and of Luther at Worms." At the critical moment, when it was hoped that the liberty of speech would be vindicated, a Methodist preacher named John Hogan arose, and, in a violent, vindictive harangue, rekindled the mobocratic spirit and prepared the way for the tragedy that followed.

Mr. Lovejoy's new press arrived on the morning of Nov. 7th, and the news of its arrival was proclaimed to the mob by the blowing of horns. The mayor superintended its transfer to the warehouse and aided in storing it away. Great excitement prevailed during the day, but at nine o'clock in the evening, there being no sign of an assault, most of the defenders of the press retired, leaving a dozen persons or so, who were willing, if necessary, to risk their lives in defending the freedom of speech. An hour or two later, the mob, thirty or forty in number, issued from the grog-shops, prepared to do the work to which they had been incited by the speeches of the Rev. Dr. Joel Parker and the Rev. John Hogan. The defenders of the press were armed, and resolved to do what they thought to be their duty. Mr. Lovejoy himself was among them. The mob threw stones at the building, broke windows and fired several shots. Then the cry went up, "Burn them out!" Ladders were obtained and preparations made to set the building on fire. The mayor came, with a justice of the peace, and they were sent into the building to propose the surrender of the press, on condition that its defenders should not be injured. The mayor told the owner of the warehouse that it was not in his power to protect the building. He reported to the rioters that their terms were rejected, whereupon they set up the cry, "Fire the building, and shoot every d——d Abolitionist as he leaves." The mob mounted the building and fired the roof. Five of the defenders rushed out of the warehouse, fired upon the mob and returned. Mr. Lovejoy and two others then stepped out, and were fired upon by rioters concealed behind a pile of lumber. Mr. Lovejoy received five balls, three of them in his breast. He lived long enough to return to the counting-room, where, after exclaiming, "I am shot! I am shot!" he almost instantly expired. After his death his friends offered to surrender, but the offer was refused. As they left the burning building they were fired upon, but no one was killed. The mob then rushed in, broke the press in pieces and threw them into the river. The next day the body of the martyr was buried by his friends, the infuriated mobocrats regarding the scene with manifest exultation. Alton, from that very day, went under a cloud, from which she did not emerge for years. Her prosperity was smitten with a moral blight. Her very name became repulsive. Emigrants of intelligence and character could not be attracted to a place whose citizens allowed a man to be ruthlessly murdered for daring to speak against slavery. The grave of the martyr, which was made upon a bluff overlooking the Mississippi, was unmarked for many years, but an appropriate monument now indicates the spot. For centuries to come, that monument, I venture to say, will attract more visitors than any other object that Alton will have to show. To the friends of liberty it will be a shrine, reminding them how much they owe to one noble man, who preferred to die rather than surrender the dearest right of an American citizen.

The Alton tragedy set everybody to discussing the slavery question. As a general rule, the newspapers condemned the mob, and criticised Mr. Lovejoy at the same time for his alleged imprudence. Here and there a pulpit spoke out bravely in condemnation of the outrage; but a larger number offered apologies for it, and made it an occasion for denouncing the Abolitionists. Dr. Channing was deeply moved, and at once proposed to hold a public meeting in Faneuil Hall of those who wished to condemn the outrage as it deserved. The first application for the hall was denied, on the ground that the resolutions and votes of the proposed meeting might be considered in other places "as the public voice of the city." This decision was certainly significant as to what was understood to be the real public sentiment of Boston in respect to the tragedy. Dr. Channing appealed from the decision of the Board of Aldermen to the people themselves, in a letter of such power that it admitted of no reasonable answer from the other side. A second application for the hall proved successful; and the proposed meeting was held on the 8th of December, 1837, — in the daytime, lest, if it should be held in the evening, Boston might once more try her hand at a mob. A large audience assembled. Hon. Jonathan Phillips, an eminent citizen, and a particular friend of

Dr. Channing, presided. Dr. Channing made a calm but most impressive address; after which, a series of resolutions — written by him — temperately yet strongly condemning the Alton outrage, and expressing a deep sense of the value and importance of the unrestricted freedom of the press, was read by B. F. Hallett. George S. Hillard followed in an earnest and able speech in support of the resolutions. When he had concluded, uprose (in the gallery) James T. Austin, Attorney-General of the State and a member of Dr. Channing's congregation, who, in a brazen way, imposed himself upon the meeting to deliver a most abusive and insulting speech. He compared the emancipation of slaves to turning loose the wild beasts of a menagerie, and declared that Lovejoy had "died as the fool dieth." The Alton mob against the freedom of the press was justified by a comparison therewith of the destruction of the tea in Boston Harbor in Revolutionary days. The speech was as offensive in manner as in matter. The speaker probably hoped that his utterances would create confusion and defeat the object of the meeting. If such was his expectation, he was doomed to a bitter disappointment. When he took his seat, a young man — then unknown to fame, but destined soon to achieve a reputation as a public speaker second to that of no other in the land or in the civilized world — stepped upon the rostrum. It was Wendell Phillips, his brow still wet with the dews of youth, the best blood of Boston in his veins, the best culture of Harvard in his head, and his tongue set aflame by the righteous indignation that filled his breast. Mr. Phillips, a few months before this, had openly identified himself with the Abolitionists. The trumpet-tones of Garrison had fallen upon his ear and touched his ingenuous heart. He had spoken several times in small anti-slavery meetings, charming all who heard him by his eloquence, grace, and devotion ; but this was his first appearance before a large assembly. I had heard him once before myself, as a few others in that great meeting probably had, and my expectations were high ; but he transcended them all, and took the audience by storm. Never before, I venture to say, did the walls of the "Old Cradle of Liberty" echo to a finer strain of eloquence, or to more exalted and ennobling sentiments than those which then fell from the lips of the young orator of freedom. It was a speech to which not even the completest literal report could do justice ; for such a report could not bring the scene—the occasion and the manner of the speaker—vividly before the reader. It was before the days of phonography, and the reporter seems to me to have caught only a pale reflection of what fell from the speaker's lips ; but here is a portion of the exordium, as reported by B. F. Hallett, one of the best of the profession at that day :—

“Mr. Chairman, when I heard the gentleman (Mr. Austin) lay down principles which placed the rioters, incendiaries, and murderers of Alton, side by side with Otis and Hancock, with Quincy and Adams, I thought those pictured lips [pointing to the portraits in the hall] would have broken into voice to rebuke the recreant American, the slanderer of the dead. Sir, the gentleman said that he should sink into insignificance if he dared not gainsay the principles of the resolutions before this meeting. Sir, for the sentiments he has uttered on soil consecrated by the prayers of Puritans and the blood of patriots, the earth should have yawned and swallowed him up.”

From this time till the close of the conflict Mr. Phillips, above all other men, was the orator of the anti-slavery cause. The announcement that he would speak, whether in city or country, was sure to attract a crowd ; and this not once or twice merely, but constantly, year after year. As a young member of the bar, a brilliant career was open before him. He had but to keep steadily on in the traditional path, and he might hope to win any honors that the old Commonwealth had to bestow. But when he heard the cry of suffering humanity, the voice of worldly ambition was hushed; and he gave all his great powers to the work of "delivering the needy, the poor also, and him that had no helper." Exalted natural endowments, the ripest culture America could give, and social advantages of the highest order, all were made tributary to an unpopular but righteous cause. His example, in this act of early self-consecration, and in the firmness of his adherence to the principles embraced in his early manhood, may be safely commended to the young men of coming generations. Perhaps no man, save Mr. Garrison himself, did more than he to create the public sentiment which opened the way to the emancipation of the slaves; and never, surely, was eloquence of the highest order consecrated to a nobler cause. Many of his friends will recall with pleasure these humorously descriptive lines of James Russell Lowell, written many years ago:—

“There, with one hand behind his back,
 Stands Phillips, buttoned in a sack,—
 Our Attic orator, our Chatham;
 Old fogies, when he lightens at 'em,
 Shrive! like leaves; to him 'tis granted
 Always to say the word that's wanted,
 So that he seems but speaking clearer
 The tip-top thought of every hearer;
 Each flash his brooding heart lets fall
 Fires what's combustible in all,
 And sends the applauses bursting in Like an exploded magazine.
 His eloquence no frothy show,
 The gutter's street-polluted flow;
 No Mississippi's yellow flood,
 Whose shoalness can't be seen for mud;
 So simply clear, serenely deep,
 So silent, strong, its graceful sweep,
 None measures its unrippling force,
 Who has not striven to stem its course.”

Another young man of Boston, and one bearing a name most honorably associated with American history from the earliest period, was led by the Alton tragedy to identify himself with the despised cause of abolition. I allude to Edmund Quincy, youngest son of Josiah Quincy, Sr., formerly a member of Congress from Boston, afterwards for several years mayor of the city, and later still president of Harvard University. Mr. Quincy was a graduate of Harvard, a young man of great intellectual ability, ripe culture, fine literary tastes, and unswerving rectitude of character. In a letter asking that his name might be enrolled as a member of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, he said: "I have deferred too long enrolling my name on the list of that noble army, which for seven years past has maintained the right, and gallantly defended the cause of our common humanity, undismayed by danger and undeterred by obloquy; but I hope that in whatever fields yet remain to be fought you will find me in the thickest of the fray, at the side of our veteran chiefs, whether the warfare be directed against the open hostility of professed foes, or the more dangerous attacks of hollow friends." And well did he fulfil the promise conveyed in these words, though in doing so he incurred a measure of social obloquy which few others in our ranks were called to endure. Not once did he shirk any service for the cause which it was in his power to render. At the meeting called by the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society to commemorate the death of Lovejoy, he made his first anti-slavery speech, and a noble one it was, revealing a firm grasp of principles and a moral insight clear as the noonday sun. As a speaker, though impressive and forcible, he was not the equal of Phillips; but as a writer upon the questions of the day, he was highly gifted. His name and presence as a presiding officer lent dignity to many of our meetings, and his contributions to "The Liberator" and "National Anti-Slavery Standard," from the time that he entered our ranks to the end of the conflict, were as important and valuable as they were numerous. It often fell to his lot to contribute editorial articles to "The Liberator," in the absence of the editor, and he was for twenty years or more an editorial writer and correspondent of "The Standard," which was established by the American Anti-Slavery Society in New York in 1840, to replace the "conveyed" "Emancipator," and which was continued, like "The Liberator," to the end of the conflict. During a considerable part of this time he was associated with James Russell Lowell, another man who deserves honorable mention for consecrating his fresh young manhood and his fine literary abilities to the cause of the slave. Some of his noblest poems made their first appearance in "The Standard." Mr. Quincy's leaders, in their adaptation to the needs of the hour, and in respect of their literary quality, were equal to the very best to be found in any other journal; while his letters from Boston — in "The Standard," under the signature of "D. Y.," and in "The New York Tribune" under that of "Byles," — for their felicitous treatment of passing events as connected with the anti-slavery cause, and for both playful and caustic wit, were of the highest interest. In the days of Webster's apostacy and Boston's degradation as a hunting-ground for fugitive slaves, Mr. Quincy was our "Junius," and a great deal besides. It would be impossible to exaggerate the value to our cause of a writer of such varied gifts. I am certain that no series of editorial essays, written for any other journal during the Rebellion, and dealing with its ever-changing phases, would so well bear examination now as those written by Mr. Quincy for "The Standard." They were remarkable for soundness of judgment in regard to past events, and equally so for that pre-science which is a characteristic of the highest wisdom. Mr. Quincy lived to see the fruits of his self-sacrificing labors in the broken chains of the slaves, and in their transformation from chattels to citizens. It was my privilege to be intimately associated with him in the conduct of "The Standard" for many years, and were it needful, I could recall many illustrations of the nobility of his character and of his unreserved devotion to the cause. He was exceedingly modest, sometimes even shy, never seeking conspicuity or courting applause; but when the camp was beleaguered by foes, or in danger of betrayal by traitors within, his sagacity and courage were equal to the occasion. He hated meanness and treachery, whatever guise they assumed, and could set a hypocrite in the pillory with a skill that left him no chance of escape.

XIV.

Attitude of the Churches — Anti-Slavery Agitation among the Methodists — Persecution of Abolitionists — The Wesleyan Secession — The Division of 1844 — The Methodist Church a Type of Others — The Baptists — Orthodox Authorities — Old School Covenanters — The Free Presbyterians — The Quakers.

IN not a few instances, in the preceding pages, I have spoken of the hostility of the great religious denominations of the country to the anti-slavery movement, but there is need of a more distinct presentation of this branch of my subject. I am the more convinced of this because, while some of my sketches were passing through "The Tribune," complaints were made in some quarters that my statements respecting ministers and churches were unhistorical and false. I shall, therefore, devote this chapter to the subject. And I begin with the Methodist church, not only because it is one of the largest and most influential of American sects, but because I have been charged by a distinguished minister of that church with misrepresenting it.

The Methodist Episcopal church, in its earlier years, set itself strongly against slavery, apparently with a fixed determination not to be defiled by it; but long before the anti-slavery movement began, its good resolutions had been forgotten, and it had surrendered to the enemy. Its degeneracy began early. During the Revolutionary period, the influence of Wesley on the rising church was withdrawn, and "the infernal spirit of slavery," as Bishop Asbury called it, gained ascendancy over the "dear Zion;" the rules against slavery were relaxed; the foul flood began to percolate the dikes erected by Wesley, and they were at length practically swept away by its force. The church, so far as respects its laity, became a slaveholding church, nursing at its bosom a system of oppression which Wesley truly stigmatized as "the vilest that ever saw the sun." Whatever rules of discipline unfavorable to the system still remained upon its records, in the presence of this damning fact were as worthless as the Ten Commandments would be if inscribed on the walls of a gambling den. They could only serve to make the guilt of the church the more conspicuous. And yet there are those at the present day who point to these tattered remnants of laws contemned and violated, as proofs that the church, with thousands of slaveholders in her bosom, holding scores of thousands of slaves, buying and selling them at pleasure, keeping them in ignorance and degradation, and working them without wages under the lash, was yet an anti-slavery church, with, in the language of the Rev. Dr. Whedon, "a historic anti-slaveryism of her own, of which she is not a little proud." It seems to me that the pride which is built upon such a foundation must be of the sort that "goeth before destruction," indicating a "haughty spirit" that betokens "a fall." Shame and confusion of face, and tears of contrition would better befit a church in such circumstances. The prodigal son did not seek to make his early but broken resolutions of virtue a cover and excuse for "wasting his substance in riotous living," nor talk with "pride" of his "historic" merit. God's moral law, let it be remembered, is the same for churches as for individuals.

Slavery having once gained a foothold in the church, its power was augmented with every passing year. The period following the war of the Revolution was marked by a laxity of morals on every hand, which affected the Methodist church in common with others. The country, weary with excitement, longed for repose, and was little inclined to enter into any moral struggle. There was, moreover, a common feeling, that the spirit of liberty, which had triumphed over the tyranny of England and made the nation an independent republic, had gained such momentum, that, without any special efforts on the part of the people, it would of itself sweep slavery and other forms of oppression entirely away. Then came the era of the Constitution, with its sinful compromises, to work a still further demoralization. The invention of the cotton-gin, by augmenting the profits of slave labor, deadened the conscience of the whole country to the iniquity of slavery, and the testimonies against it at the North grew feebler and feebler until they dwindled at length, after the Missouri spasm in 1820, into almost utter silence. The voice of Lundy was indeed heard "crying in the wilderness," but heard by few outside of the Quaker sect. But Garrison's trumpet-call, instinct with a living principle and an indomitable purpose, awoke the sleeping land. The Methodists in New England were among the first to show signs of sensibility and interest. They were but slightly affected by the conservatism that pervaded other sects in that part of the country. They were a simple-minded people, with deep religious convictions, and therefore peculiarly susceptible to moral truths. Methodist preachers began early to read "The Liberator," which set them thinking not only about slavery, but about the guilty connection of their own church therewith. Wesley's denunciations of slavery were brought freshly to mind, and a desire to do something for the purification of the church that he had founded sprang up among both ministers and laymen. Methodist preachers here and there sought Mr. Garrison's acquaintance, and began to testify against slavery in their own pulpits, and to open them to the agents of the anti-slavery societies.

At the beginning of 1835, the columns of "Zion's Herald" were opened to the discussion of the subject, pro and con. The Rev. Orange Scott led off on the anti-slavery side in a series of able articles, which made a very powerful impression within and even beyond New England. He opposed the Colonization scheme, denounced slavery as a sin, and vindicated the doctrine and the duty of immediate emancipation. His abolitionism, in short, was avowedly Garrisonian. There was no disingenuous effort then to make it appear that the impulse to the discussion had been derived from Methodist traditions alone, and that nothing was due to Mr. Garrison on that score. That folly was reserved to be put forth by a Methodist divine in 1879, fourteen years after emancipation! He presumes too far upon human forgetfulness and the uncertainties of history in making such a claim. So far as human foresight can discover, if Garrison had not spoken, the Methodist church might have slept to this day, as it had been sleeping for years, over the sin and crime of slavery, sinking deeper and deeper into the slough from which she was finally delivered, not by her own inherent virtue or by the operation of her discipline, but by the bloody desolations of a retributive war.

From this point the agitation of the slavery question in the Methodist church went on, with various alternations, until the day of emancipation. It spread from New England to the Middle States and to the West, and stirred the South to impotent madness.

It does not lie within the scope of my work to trace the history at length. Any one who wishes to do so will find it set forth in "The History of American Slavery and Methodism," by the Rev. Lucius C. Matlack, a new edition of which, I understand, will shortly appear. The agitation was marked on the one side by a brave and earnest advocacy of anti-slavery principles, and on the other by a spirit of proscription which has few parallels in modern ecclesiastical history. The central authority of the church was dominated by the Slave Power, and though it piled no faggots and kindled no literal fires for its victims, it was yet able to make the air around them hot with the flames of persecution. Ecclesiastical chains and thumbscrews were in requisition on every hand. Anti-slavery ministers, who dared to preach or write against slavery and in favor of immediate emancipation, were marked for such forms of proscription as are still possible in the light of the nineteenth century. The power which the Methodist discipline confers upon bishops, and upon the presiding elders appointed by them, and the moral and ecclesiastical weight of the great General Conference, were employed to crush the leaders of the anti-slavery agitation. Specious and professedly affectionate appeals were first tried, and when these failed, ecclesiastical stones hurtled in the air. The Bible was appealed to for proof that slaveholding was an innocent practice, and the friends of immediate emancipation were pelted with opprobrious epithets. A New England bishop declared that "the right to hold a slave is founded on this rule: 'Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.'" Dr. Wilbur Fisk, the great leader of New England Methodism, declared that "the general rule of Christianity not only permits, but in supposable circumstances enjoins, a continuance of the master's authority." "I have never yet," said Bishop Soule, "advised the liberation of a slave, and I think I never shall." "There is," said the editor of "The Christian Advocate and Journal," "no express prohibition to Christians to hold slaves." The Southern Conferences were allowed to pronounce opinions favorable to slavery, and to fulminate their hostility to the Abolitionists, in such language as their vindictive temper might suggest; but when Northern Conferences essayed to utter a testimony against slavery and in favor of emancipation, the presiding bishops refused to put the question to vote, claiming it as their prerogative to decide what subjects, outside of the prescribed disciplinary routine, should be acted upon. The minions of the Slave Power on the floor of Congress were no more arbitrary or insolent than these bishops and their tools.

But it was all in vain. The agitation went on in spite of the most desperate efforts to extinguish it; indeed, as might have been expected, these efforts only added to its intensity. The great body of the preachers in New England soon became Abolitionists, as did those, if I mistake not, of some other Conferences. Their leaders, Sunderland, Scott, Horton, Storrs, Lee, Matlack and others, were powerful men, and they fought a brave battle; but they could never carry the main fortress of the enemy, commanded as it was by the central powers of the church. Mr. Sunderland established an anti-slavery paper, "Zion's Watchman," in New York, and conducted it for years, with great ability, bringing upon himself a load of persecution, social and ecclesiastical, that he found hard to bear. "The result of this extensive series of proscriptions," says Mr. Matlack in his History, p. 296, "was soon felt and manifested. It generated a loss of confidence in the integrity of the prime ministers, who, in many cases, were the prime movers of these measures. This was associated with a decrease of attachment to the church itself, while many desired to give a powerful testimony against slavery that should be felt throughout the land. These things combined prepared the way for the withdrawal from the Methodist Episcopal Church, on the alleged ground that it was hopelessly wedded to slavery, and could only be waked up to see its true position by such decided action."

The Wesleyan Methodist Church, composed of six thousand members, most of them seceders from the M. E. Church, and seventy-five or eighty pastors, was organized at Utica, N. Y., May 31, 1843. Its discipline condemned slavery as a sin. This movement alarmed the old church. The new organization was gaining rapidly in numbers, when the General Conference of the old church assembled in New York in May, 1844. The pro-slavery party, sobered by the secession of so large a body of members, and apprehensive of still further losses, began to think that discretion was the better part of valor, and that it was best for the old church to take some sort of action that would have a tendency to stem the tide of anti-slavery secession. An occasion was furnished in the circumstance that J. O. Andrew, one of the Southern Bishops, had become a slaveholder by marriage. No instance of this sort having occurred before, it was resolved by the members to make a virtue of passing some form of censure upon the bishop. It was hoped at first that the Southern members, after all that their Northern brethren had done to protect the system of slavery from the assaults of the Abolitionists, would themselves quietly consent to this action, which was necessary to save the Northern wing of the church from further disintegration.

But Southern Methodists were in no mood to submit to this arrangement, merely for the purpose of enabling their Northern brethren to say, "See! we are opposed to slavery; have we not unfrocked a slaveholding bishop?" The Southern brethren, having for years received from their Northern associates the comforting assurance that slaveholding was no sin, but a practice sanctioned by the Bible and not forbidden by the discipline, could not understand why a censure should be passed upon Bishop Andrew for doing only what the whole body of the Southern laity and many of the preachers had been permitted to do without objection for half a century. If "the right to hold a slave" was "founded upon the Golden Rule," as Bishop Hedding said it was, why should a bishop of the church be denounced for exercising that right? Had the lay members and preachers a monopoly of the rights conferred by the Golden Rule? If Bishop Andrew were pronounced a sinner for being a slaveholder, would not a stigma be fastened by implication upon every other slaveholder at the South? This was the logic of the case to the Southern members, and they felt that to yield what the Northern brethren demanded, on grounds of expediency, merely to help them out of a difficulty, would be nothing less than a surrender of the very citadel of slavery. They firmly refused to do as they were requested, and threatened to secede if their favorite bishop were censured. Having ruled the church so long, they were not inclined to give up the reins of authority now.

Here was a dread alternative for the Northern brethren. If they should let the slaveholding bishop pass without censure, the Wesleyans would devour their heritage; if they dared to censure him, they would drive out almost the whole body of Southern Methodists, to retain whom they had stooped in the past to every form of self-stultifying humiliation. In view of what they had said of slavery in previous years, they could not pretend to act upon any ground of principle, but only upon one of expediency, in censuring the bishop. The Baltimore Conference, either hoping that the more Southern conferences would not carry out their threats, or holding that a secession on that side would be the least of two evils, concluded to join the North in censuring the bishop, and so the measure was carried. The Southern conferences thereupon seceded. And now the church North proceeded to exalt itself as an anti-slavery body, though slavery still existed, exactly as before, in no less than eight of its conferences, and though she had exerted all her powers of persuasion to induce the whole church South, with her thousands of lay slaveholders and her hundreds of slaveholding preachers, to remain in full fellowship with her. It strikes me that the refusal to sanction in a single bishop what had for half a century been freely allowed to tens of thousands of laymen and multitudes of preachers, was a very narrow foundation on which to set up a claim for an anti-slavery reputation; but that was what the Methodist Episcopal Church did after the Southerners withdrew. She did not even trouble herself to make a single effort to free the twenty thousand or more slaves still held within her pale, nor call to account the slaveholding preachers whose names still remained upon her rolls. And to-day there are Methodists blind enough to claim that the refusal to endorse a slaveholding bishop was an adequate atonement for conniving with slavery for scores of years, for all the apologies and defences of the system woven from Scripture texts by bishops and theological professors, for the desperate attempt pursued for years to put down the anti-slavery agitation, and for the dreadful persecutions visited upon Sunderland, Scott, and other faithful friends of the slave!

Does any one ask why I have told this story of the complicity of a great church with slavery? I answer: Because I would pay a tribute of respect and admiration to the brave champions who fought the battles of the slave against such tremendous odds, bearing reproach with meekness and patience; because the anti-slavery agitation in the Methodist Church was part of the great movement that originated with Garrison; and finally, because the interests of truth require the exposure, for the warning of men in a time to come, of every such betrayal of the interests of humanity and of the cause of Christ. I do not for a moment imagine that Hedding and Fisk, and Olin and Bangs, and their associates, had any love for slavery in itself considered. What they desired was to build up a great and united church. For this they were willing to close their ears and steel their hearts to the cry of suffering humanity, and to torture the Bible in the interest of the slave-masters. Grant even that they were pro-church rather than pro-slavery in their hearts; this does not in the least diminish the heinousness of their sin. For that sin the present generation of Methodists is no otherwise responsible than as it apologizes therefor and seeks to cover it up. The only honorable course involves a frank acknowledgment of the sin of the fathers. The Divine declaration, "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper; but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy," is as true of churches as it is of individuals. An apology might be framed for the politicians and parties that "bent the knee to the dark spirit of slavery," on the same ground upon which it is sought to excuse the clergy and the churches for the same offence. Northern Whigs and Democrats did not love slavery for its own sake; they only wished to preserve and augment the strength of their parties. If they had seen a way of doing this while fighting slavery, they might have adopted it eagerly. But this view of the matter aggravates rather than diminishes their inhumanity and guilt. What worse indeed could we say of any man, than that his love for his party overmasters his love for humanity, and that his desire for the external prosperity of his church exceeds his solicitude for its purity and his regard for the law of God?

I have said nothing specifically thus far of the Baptist denomination. If space permitted, however, I could "a tale unfold" of the complicity of that branch of the church with slavery, of heroic but unsuccessful struggles to redeem it from blood-guiltiness, and of opprobrium and persecution endured by noble men in the prosecution of that work, in most respects parallel with that which I have told concerning the Methodists. Northern and Southern Baptist churches were in close affiliation with each other; in the latter, slavery existed in its most odious form, and the whole power of the denomination, from first to last, was exerted to screen slaveholders and slaveholding churches from censure. Some of the men who fought for freedom and purity in this denomination with little success, were Rev. Cyrus P. Grosvenor, Rev. Duncan Dunbar and Rev. Elon Galusha. The Rev. Richard Furman, of South Carolina, was the first president of the Triennial Convention in which Northern and Southern Baptists met in fraternal union. After Mr. Furman's death his estate was sold at auction, and was advertised in these terms: "A plantation or tract of land on and in Wateree Swamp; . . . a library of a miscellaneous character, chiefly theological; 27 NEGROES, some of them very prime; 2 mules, 1 horse, and an old wagon." Dr. Wayland, President of Brown University, was the Coryphæus of the Baptist denomination, and while, in his "Moral Philosophy," he pronounced slavery wrong, he could never be persuaded that the Baptist churches at the North ought to do anything to abolish it, or that it was wrong for them to be in religious fellowship with those who sold human beings (perhaps Baptist Christians) at auction, along with mules, horses and old wagons. In 1838, when the consciences of Northern Christians were beginning to be tender on this subject, he published a book, "The Limitations of Human Responsibility," in which, after wading through a great array of preliminaries and drawing a great many fine distinctions on a variety of subjects, he came to the one point which he seems to have had in view at the start; viz., that the people of the North were in such relations with the South, constitutionally and otherwise, that they ought not to agitate the subject of slavery, and that it would be an act of bad faith for Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia!

Making due allowance for differences of ecclesiastical organization, the Methodist and Baptist churches, in their relations to slavery, may be taken as types of all the other great denominations of the country. The Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregational, Unitarian and Universalist churches, with some differences as to method, location, etc., were essentially alike in spirit, in their firm resistance to the anti-slavery movement, and in their refusal or neglect to adopt any efficient measures for the overthrow of slavery. They were alike in exerting their ingenuity to evade the subject entirely; and when this was found to be impossible, they all alike made their action as feeble and meaningless as lay in their power. When public opinion compelled them, as it sometimes did, to take some sort of action that would seem to be anti-slavery, it was usually put in such a shape as to amount to little or nothing—in short, mere buncombe. Denunciations of the system of slavery, with mental reservations for individual slaveholding, were often put forth to deceive the unwary and as a sop for uneasy consciences. And when passably satisfactory resolutions were adopted, as they sometimes were, by local ecclesiastical bodies, they became worthless for lack of corresponding action. What would be thought of a great church that contented itself with adopting an occasional resolution of sympathy for the heathen, recognizing their need of the gospel, but which established no missions, sent forth no missionaries, and never took up a contribution for any missionary treasury? Would such a church have credit for sincerity? I trow not. And now I ask what one of all the great churches in this Christian country ever formed a purpose to overthrow or assist in overthrowing slavery, and then proceeded either to adopt measures of its own for that purpose, or to assist in carrying out measures proposed by others to that end? In the days when African colonization was accepted at the North as a remedy for slavery, the churches (or many of them) used to take up contributions in aid of the scheme; but how often did the anti-slavery movement, in any of its forms, have the benefit of such aid? Admit, for the sake of the argument, that the churches had good reason for standing aloof from Garrison, was that a justifiable excuse for doing nothing? If others were seeking the abolition of slavery by unwise methods, or even making their opposition to the system a cover for their hostility to the churches, was it not all the more the duty of the churches to array their whole moral power in support of some wise movement against that gigantic national crime? If the churches had any plan of their own for the abolition of slavery, what was it? If they ever struck hands with each other to break the shackles of the slaves, when was it? That with one consent they received slaveholders to their communion and admitted them to their pulpits, contending the while that holding slaves was perfectly compatible with Christianity, I know full well. But in what way did they, as organized bodies, bring the power of Christianity to bear against slavery and its supporters? Brave men there were in all these folds, who struggled to bring their several denominations to a sense of their responsibility, and lead them to take earnest anti-slavery action. These men were maligned and persecuted, while the churches closed their ears to such entreaties, and rushed on in their pro-slavery course. And now behold! an effort is made, with some professedly anti-slavery men assenting, to shield the churches behind these very men, and to blot out a chapter of history as disgraceful as any that can be found in ecclesiastical annals. The effort will be abortive — the ugly facts will be proclaimed, for the instruction and warning of men in all coming time.

There are men, who, when the truth on this subject is spoken, stand ready to say it is all a slander of those who hate Christianity, at least in the "evangelical" meaning of the term. It is important to unmask these men, and show that not Garrisonian Abolitionists alone, but men of the strictest orthodoxy have made precisely the same allegations against the churches, on account of their pro-slavery attitude and course, as were made by Mr. Garrison. For this purpose I cite the following testimony: —

JAMES G. BIRNEY, Presbyterian.

The American churches are the bulwarks of American slavery.

REV. MR. MCLANE, Mississippi.

[In Presbyterian General Assembly at Buffalo.]

We have men in our churches who buy slaves, and work them, because they can make more money by it than any other way. And the more of such men we have the better. All who can, own slaves; and those who cannot want to.

MR. STEWART, Ruling Elder, of Illinois.

[In General Assembly of 1835.]

Ministers of the gospel and doctors of divinity may engage in this unholy traffic [separating brothers and sisters, husbands and wives, parents and children], and yet sustain their high and holy calling. Elders, ministers, and doctors of divinity are with both hands engaged in the practice.

ALBERT BARNES, Presbyterian.

Let the time come when, in all the mighty denominations of Christians, it can be announced that slavery has ceased with them forever; and let the voice from each denomination be lifted up in kind, but firm and solemn testimony against the system — with no “mealy” words; with no attempt at apology; with no wish to blink it; with no effort to throw the sacred shield of religion over so great an evil — and the work is done. There is no public sentiment in this land — there could be none created, that would resist the power of such testimony. There is no power out of the church that could sustain slavery an hour if it were not sustained in it.

These words of Mr. Barnes, mild as they are, justify, and more than justify, every accusation brought against the American churches by Mr. Garrison, or any one else in the anti-slavery ranks. Having the power to strike the chains from the slaves at any time, they not only refused to exercise that power, but did what they could to hinder those who were working with that end in view. They did not even emancipate the slaves within their own pale, but continued to hold them as long as they could, and until their shackles were broken by war.

RALPH WARDLAW, Scotland.

So long as a church holds that slavery is authorized by the scriptures, it is an anti-Christian church, and not a church of Christ.

HON. WILLIAM JAY, Episcopalian.

The shocking insensibility of our churches, religious societies, and religious men to the iniquities of slavery, of course involves them in gross inconsistencies, degrades the character of the gospel of Christ, and gives a mighty impulse to infidelity. . . . From men like Paine and most of his followers the church has little to fear. But a new class of converts to infidelity is springing up, men whose fearless and disinterested fidelity to truth, mercy and justice extort unwitting respect. These men reject the gospel, not because it rebukes their vices, but because they are taught by certain of its clergy, and the conduct of a multitude of its professors, that it sanctions the most horrible cruelty and oppression, allowing the rich and powerful forcibly to reduce the poor and helpless to the condition of working animals, articles of commerce, and to keep their posterity in ignorance and degradation to the end of time.

It is certainly no exaggerated statement, that not one sermon in a thousand delivered at the North contains the slightest allusion to the duties of Christians towards the colored population; while at the South multitudes of the clergy are as deeply involved in the iniquity of slavery as their hearers. It is no libel on the great body of our Northern clergy to say that, in regard to the wrongs of the colored people, instead of performing the part of the good Samaritan, their highest merit consists in following the example of the priest and Levite in passing by on the other side without inflicting new injuries on their wounded brother.

What does the church? She declares from her lowest to her highest judicatories that slavery shall not be interfered with; that the system is legal — nay, even Scriptural — and that they who declare it an outrage against Republicanism and the Bible, are fanatics and incendiaries.

LEWIS TAPPAN—1855.

The Abolitionists have not only to contend with the slave power, with a pro-slavery government, with ecclesiastical bodies and national societies in complicity with slavery, but with a large body of ministers, editors and church-members, in the free States, who style themselves anti-slavery people, and yet afford aid and countenance to the iniquitous system by their apologies, mystifications, glosses and misstatements.

ARTHUR TAPPAN — 1857.

We appear to be making no progress in enlisting the churches in favor of anti-slavery missions, or in bringing them to our views respecting fellowshipping slaveholders and slaveholding churches. What can we expect from the almost universal church in this country, that, even in the free States, grinds the face of the colored people with the denial of every, or nearly every, political and religious, civil and social privilege? Even here, in Orthodox Connecticut, they are driven to associate in separate churches, separate schools, and to lie in separate burying-grounds, and are ignored in all their civil rights as citizens, except that of paying taxes.

I could fill a hundred pages with citations not less emphatic than these, from scores of earnest evangelical men, against whom there was never a suspicion of heresy. I have taken these simply because they were close at hand. When anybody can exculpate the American clergy and churches from the above charges, he will have nothing further to do to sweep away as lies the accusations of Mr. Garrison and his associates. Until then let men cease their attempts to evade the issue by charging Abolitionists with enmity to evangelical religion.

I have already given the Freewill Baptists credit for their refusal to admit slaveholding churches to their communion. The Old School Covenanters also deserve mention for their firm and consistent opposition to slavery. Some of them heartily co-operated with the Garrisonians. The Rev. J. R. W. Sloane, then of New York, now of Allegheny, Penn., never hesitated to stand on our platform even when charges of infidelity were flying thickest about our heads. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that "The Free Presbyterian Church" was organized somewhere about 1850, by seceders from the two larger Presbyterian bodies, on account of their pro-slavery attitude. One of the leaders in this movement was the Rev. John Rankin of Ohio, who bore a faithful testimony against slavery even before the days of Mr. Garrison; another was the Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Penn., one of the most faithful friends of freedom.

It has often been said that the Abolitionists did not recognize the anti-slavery work done by ministers and private Christians. This is a great mistake. Such men were always honored, and received on our platform with an eager welcome. We were too grateful for their help to neglect them. If men from the churches came in a half-hearted spirit, their mouths filled with apologies for their pro-slavery brethren, and with only hard words for the Abolitionists, and seeking to lower the standard in deference to the feelings and wishes of the apologists for slavery, they were stoutly resisted, of course. But no earnest Christian worker was ever repelled.

It is often said that Garrisonian Abolitionists singled out evangelical ministers and churches for censure, letting the liberals escape. There is not a shadow of truth in this accusation. I doubt if evangelical ministers and churches were ever once spoken of as a class distinct from others. Certainly there never was any occasion for such discrimination, for the liberal churches were as recreant as the evangelical, and our resolutions included them all alike. We did not even make the Quakers an exception, for they, in their associated capacity, were scarcely less delinquent than the rest. The ministers, elders and overseers were opposed to the anti-slavery agitation, and private members were often proscribed and sometimes disowned for their abolitionism. Many Quaker preachers were in the constant practice of alluding in their ministrations to the anti-slavery movement as organized "in the will of man," and therefore unworthy of the support of Friends; and the members of the body were exhorted to "keep in the quiet," to "mind their own business," and not mix themselves with the agitators of the day. One of the bitterest and most vehement pro-slavery preachers I ever heard was an eminent minister of the Society of Friends in New York. It was the monthly meeting dominated by this man that disowned the venerable Quaker, Isaac T. Hopper, the sweet-hearted Charles Marriott, and James S. Gibbons, the faithful friend of the slave, for nothing but their activity in the anti-slavery cause. Quaker meeting-houses were generally closed against anti-slavery lecturers.

Rev. Samuel J. May, in his "Recollections of the Anti-Slavery Conflict," tells us that when, in 1835, at the suggestion of some Friends, he went to Newport at the time of the New England Yearly Meeting, in the hope of finding some opportunity of presenting the claims of the cause to the Quakers who were expected to assemble there, he found that the leaders of the body had hired every hall in the city to prevent him from gaining a hearing; and they even attempted, though unsuccessfully, to exclude him from one of the boarding-houses frequented by members of the sect. During the two years that I was the Secretary and General Agent of the Rhode Island Anti-Slavery Society, there was no influence working against the cause more insidious or potent than that of the Quakers.

When the facts illustrating the pro-slavery attitude of the churches are presented as above, we are often referred to the uprising of the clergy of New England to resist the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and to what they did afterwards in support of the Republican party, especially during the war. Yes, thank God! they did rally in that crisis, and I am not sure that without their aid the country could have been saved. For what they did at that time and afterwards let them have the full measure of credit that is their due. But I insist that their activity then neither disproves what I have said of their attitude during the twenty preceding years, nor furnishes any excuse for the course they pursued during that period. But for their indifference to the wrongs of the slave, their apologies for slaveholding, or their guilty silence on the subject, the Slave Power would probably not even have thought of repealing the Missouri Compromise. After the slaveholders had received for years from Northern professors of theology the comforting assurance that slaveholding was not a sin, and that the Abolitionists were fanatics, meddling with what did not concern them, and when they had observed that the great body of Christian men at the North apparently cared nothing for slavery in any way, what more natural than that they should conclude that the compact of 1820 could be annulled without more than a ripple of excitement? If the churches had been alive to the slavery question from 1830 to 1850, that compact would never have been annulled.

XV.

Activity of Women — Example of England and Virginia — Mrs Mott in the Convention of 1833 — Female Societies — Sarah and Angelina Grimké — Their Visit to New York — Their Labors in Massachusetts — The “Brookfield Bull” — Whittier’s Poem — “Southside” Adams and Governor Wise.

ONE special sign of the rapid progress of the cause from 1835 to 1838 was seen in the increasing activity of women in its behalf. The reports current among us of the mighty work which had been done by the women of England, especially in the way of petitioning Parliament for the immediate emancipation of the slaves of the West Indies, had awakened a deep interest and created no little enthusiasm. American women were learning to imitate the example of their sisters in Great Britain. Nor were they without an example of a similar kind among the women of their own country—even in Virginia! Many reproaches have been heaped upon the anti-slavery women of the North for forsaking their “appropriate sphere,” but the credit for originality in taking that dreadful step, so much deplored by sentimental apologists of slavery, belongs to the women of the Ancient Dominion. Honor to whom honor is due. After the Southampton insurrection of 1831, at least two petitions from women were presented in the Virginia House of Delegates. One of these was from Augusta County, and signed by three hundred and forty-three of the sex; the other was “the memorial of the female citizens of Fluvanna.” Of the purport of the first of these petitions I have no knowledge, save that it was referred to by Benjamin Watkins Leigh as being of an anti-slavery character. The second was a most eloquent appeal to the House of Delegates to devise a method for the abolition of slavery, the evils of which were most feelingly depicted by the petitioners. If the Legislature of Virginia had given heed to this appeal, and entered upon the work of abolition in friendly co-operation with the Abolitionists of the North, in what a different channel might have run the tides of American history!

In the Convention which formed the American Anti-Slavery Society a small number of women were in constant attendance, not as members, but as spectators. The names of three only of these have been preserved: Lucretia Mott, Esther Moore, and Lydia White--all Quakers, the first a minister of her sect in high standing. So broad and free was the spirit of the Convention, and so glad were its members of any manifestation of interest in the cause, that the presence of these women was not felt to be an impropriety; and when Lucretia Mott arose to speak, as she did more than once, not one of the clerical members cried shame, or even remembered to throw at her a text from St. Paul. At first, when she seemed to be hesitating lest she should be deemed an intruder by some, the orthodox President, Rev. Beriah Green, was prompt to encourage her. "Go on, madam," he said, "we shall all be glad to hear you," and out of the Convention came other voices also, saying heartily, "Go on," "Go on." Thus welcomed, she did go on, and Mr. May says that "she made a more impressive and effective speech than any other that was made in the Convention, excepting only our President's closing address." She spoke repeatedly after this, and so pertinently that some of her suggestions upon topics before the Convention were adopted. Esther Moore and Lydia White also took part in the discussions.

When humanity is uppermost in the hearts of men, and a noble cause inspires their enthusiasm, how quickly prejudice melts away! If the propriety of woman's speaking in public had been introduced in that body as an abstract question, how many of the members would have been quick to cite the authority of Paul against the practice. But when the women themselves were actually present, and seeking an opportunity to speak for the enslaved, no one even thought of objecting. Near the close of the Convention a resolution was introduced and adopted in these words:—

“That the thanks of the Convention be presented to our female friends for the deep interest they have manifested in the cause of anti-slavery during the long and fatiguing session of this Convention.”

And this is the way that “the woman question” was first introduced into the anti-slavery cause. “Ah,” says some one, “but those women were not enrolled as members of the Convention; they only spoke, in an exceptional way, by sufferance.” Very true; but how is the principle involved in any way affected by the question of membership? Was not Paul's injunction to “keep silence” as binding upon spectators as upon members? I am quite sure that if Paul himself had been a member of the Convention—as he would have been very likely to be if he had been living in that generation—and had once looked into the face of Lucretia Mott, he would have been among the first to cry out, “Go on, madam, we shall all be glad to hear you.” He would have been quick to perceive that his rule of “silence,” however proper and necessary at the time and for the people among whom it was promulgated, would be an absurdity if applied to the women of America, and especially to such women as honored that Convention by their presence. St. Paul was no fool, whatever folly may be attributed to him by those who would like to use his words as a cudgel to beat back the friends of progress in their onward march. It is not too much to say that Lucretia Mott, who, as I write, still lives in revered old age, to make sweeter and purer, by her gracious presence, the moral atmosphere of the world, must be reckoned among those who have done the most to break the fetters of the American slaves. She was an Abolitionist in the days when, even in her own sect, the name was one of reproach, and when the rulers in the church would have been glad to silence her voice or cast her out of the synagogue. No more shining example of all the virtues that exalt womanhood, and make it a power for the redemption of the human race from ignorance and sin, can be found in the history of the world. The bigotry that would silence a voice so potent for good as hers, or presume to limit her "sphere" by any ancient rule or law, belongs rather to the middle ages than to the nineteenth century. It is not that she is or has been eloquent above many others, but that the simplest words spoken by her are endued with a power which CHARACTER alone can give to any human utterance.

The reader has already seen with what courage the Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society faced the mob of "gentlemen of property and standing" in 1835. Similar societies were formed in other cities and towns, and in May, 1837, a convention of anti-slavery women from the different States was held in New York. It was an object of scorn and ridicule on the part of the press, both secular and religious, but its members were too deeply in earnest in their work to care for that. When they thought of the degradation and helplessness of the slave women of the South, their hearts told them it was their duty to do what they could for their deliverance from so terrible a fate. They took counsel together as to the ways and means by which they might hope to succeed in arousing the women of the North to a sense of their responsibility for the crimes and woes of slavery. A stream of vulgar abuse was poured upon their heads, and their proceedings were shamefully perverted and travestied in the newspapers. I venture to say that during the ensuing three months more pulpits made that convention a subject for stinging reproach than were moved to utter a testimony against slavery itself. But what a change! The ground which the anti-slavery women won in face of such a storm of missiles, and which they trod with bleeding feet, is now occupied by the women of the popular churches, who ride over it, four-in-hand, with the applause of the world ringing in their ears. No meetings now are more popular than those of women associated in missionary societies and in other agencies for benevolent work. They are not even aware of the toils and sacrifices by which the highway on which they travel with so much ease and pleasure was cast up for their use, and many of them will, no doubt, be ready to cast stones at those who shall presume to take any new step forward. But this is no ground for discouragement; it has been so from the beginning, and will be so doubtless to the end. Let the words of Lowell cheer us:—

“Get but the Truth once uttered, and 'tis like
A star new-born, that drops into its place,
And which, once circling in its placid round,
Not all the tumults of the earth can shake.”

It was in the darkest hour of the movement, when many were fainting by the way, that two noble women from South Carolina came among us with words of hope and cheer. Sarah and Angelina Grimké, daughters of Judge John F. Grimké, and sisters of the late Thomas S. Grimké, of Charleston, who took so prominent a part in resisting the tide of Nullification in that State in 1831-32, left South Carolina because they could no longer endure existence in an atmosphere polluted by slavery, and because they desired to do something to arouse the white women of the country to a sense of their responsibility for the wrongs and woes of their sisters in bondage. They had resided in Philadelphia several years before "The Liberator" first appeared. They had been brought up in the Episcopal Church; but they found that church so wedded to slavery, that they withdrew from it and joined themselves to the Orthodox Quakers, among whom Sarah, the elder of the two, became an approved minister. In 1836 Angelina published a heart-moving "Appeal to the Women of the South," on the subject of slavery. The appearance of this pamphlet suggested to Mr. Wright, the Secretary of the American Anti-Slavery Society, that the author and her sister might do a great deal of good if they would consent to come to New York, and address companies of women in private houses, disclosing to them what they had witnessed of the degrading influences of slavery in their native State. They entered upon this work at Mr. Wright's invitation, though at their own expense. So much interest did they awaken that no parlor or drawing-room could hold the crowds of women who pressed to hear them. The Rev. Dr. Dunbar, the Scotch pastor of the Baptist church in McDougal Street, opened his lecture-room to them; and when this in turn became too small, they spoke several times in the church of the Rev. Henry G. Ludlow. Their appearance was most impressive, and the revelations they made of the wrongs and immoralities of slavery produced a powerful effect. Angelina, in the words of Lucy Stone, "had rare gifts. The eloquence which is born of earnestness in a noble purpose gave her anointed lips." She was then in her womanly prime, handsome in person and graceful in manner, with a musical and ringing voice, as penetrating as it was pleasant. In her simple Quaker garb, her intelligent face lighted up with animation, as she stood before an audience, she presented a most lovely picture of womanhood. She was entirely self-possessed, without a suggestion of masculine assurance, and mistress of her facts and of all the questions to which they were related.

As might have been expected, the appearance at the North of these women, self-exiled from the land of slavery, and devoting themselves to the work of creating sympathy for their sisters in bonds, caused no little excitement. The slaveholders were angry and abusive, and so also were their Northern apologists. But the Abolitionists regarded them with affection and reverence for their works' sake, and indulged the brightest hopes from the influence they were fitted to exert. When the Seventy agents of the American Anti-Slavery Society gathered in New York for instruction, these women consented to meet with them and to give them the benefit of their knowledge and experience of the workings of slavery. They also attended the Women's Anti-Slavery Convention referred to above, and took an active part in the proceedings. Early in 1837 the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society invited them to come and labor among the women of that State. Thither they went at the close of the New York anniversaries, and spent nearly or quite a year. They went from place to place, as the way opened before them, speaking sometimes in private parlors, sometimes in vestries or halls, and occasionally in a church. It mattered not whether the place were large or small, it was sure to be overcrowded. Women, as they returned from the meetings, gave glowing accounts of what they had heard, and often expressed the wish that their fathers, husbands and brothers might enjoy an opportunity of listening to what affected them so deeply. The interest and curiosity awakened by their labors increased so much that many men desired to hear them. It was known that the ladies themselves had no objection to the presence of men in their meetings. Quakers that they were, they had no horror of addressing promiscuous assemblies. At length the Rev. Amos A. Phelps, General Agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, being in Lynn at the time when they were speaking to a crowd of women in the great Methodist church on the Common, overcome by curiosity, forgot the injunction of Paul, stepped inside the door with a friend and stayed till the addresses were over. After this no effort was made to exclude men from the meetings, and they flocked to them in crowds. The efforts of Mr. Phelps to induce a restoration of the rule, which he had been the first to break, were ludicrous enough; but his Orthodox brethren had been quick to add this to the list of his sins in becoming an Abolitionist, and to charge the anti-slavery movement with a tendency if not a design to put woman out of her sphere and to disturb the sacred foundations of social life. This added not a little to the burdens which Mr. Phelps had been required to bear in becoming an Abolitionist, and which I am glad to say he had borne firmly and bravely. He was fitted by ability and culture for a high place in his denomination, and here was a fresh obstacle laid in his path by his own hand. The women at that day, as in the present, were the strongest allies of the clergy, and in many things their main reliance. The ladies from South Carolina were making a very deep impression upon their sex wherever they went, and pro-slavery ministers felt that some strong measures must be taken to counteract their influence. I believe they were more afraid of those two women than they would have been of a dozen lecturers of the other sex.

When the General Association of Congregational Ministers met that summer in West Brookfield, the managers laid their heads together and came to the conclusion to make the usual Pastoral Letter the vehicle of an assault upon the obnoxious ladies as enticing women from their appropriate sphere and loosening the foundations of the family. The preparation of the document, whether by special appointment or the regular working of the ecclesiastical red-tape I know not, was assigned to the Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Adams, who afterwards, by his subserviency to the Slave Power, earned for himself the sobriquet of "Southside." He was the man just fitted to produce that combination of shallow sophistry with pious sentimentalism, in a letter to the churches, which the occasion required. The document opened the subject by referring to "perplexed and agitating subjects" (meaning the one subject of slavery), "which are now common amongst us," and then mildly suggested that they "should not be forced upon any church as matters for debate at the hazard of alienation and division." As the pro-slavery party was certain to create "alienation and division" in any church where slavery was discussed, this could only mean that the subject should not be introduced at all in any church. "We are compelled to mourn," said this Protestant encyclical, "over the loss of that deference to the pastoral office which no minister would arrogate, but which is at once a mark of Christian urbanity, and a uniform attendant of the full influence of religion upon the individual character." The churches were reminded of "the importance of maintaining that respect and deference to the pastoral office which is enjoined in the Scriptures, and which is essential to the best influence of the ministry on you and your children." "One way," said these "overseers," "in which this respect has been in some cases violated, is in encouraging lecturers or preachers on certain topics of reform (meaning slavery) to present their subjects within the parochial limits of settled pastors without their consent. Your minister is ordained of God to be your teacher, and is commissioned of God to feed the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made him overseer. If there are certain topics upon which he does not preach with the frequency or in the manner that would please you, it is a violation of sacred and important rights to encourage a stranger to present them. Deference and subordination are essential to the happiness of society, and peculiarly so in the relation of a people to their pastor."

This is High Church Congregationalism in all its naked deformity. It is gravely assumed that every clergyman settled over a parish holds a commission from God, and is empowered by the Holy Ghost to determine what subjects shall be discussed, and what lecturers shall be permitted to open their mouths within the parochial limits; and the members of the churches are reminded that they cannot disregard this Divine arrangement without a "violation of the most sacred and important rights," nor without endangering the loss of their piety. "Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves," said these parish popes, who, indifferent themselves to the wrongs of the slaves, would, if possible, have stopped the mouth of any other person whose humanity impelled him to remember those in bonds as bound with them.

In the next place, these lords over God's heritage call the attention of the churches to "the dangers which at present seem to threaten the female character with widespread and permanent injury." From what source did these dangers arise? Were these men, "commissioned of God" to rule the parishes of Massachusetts, alarmed by the fact that a vast body of women at the South were degraded to the level of chattelhood, bought and sold, like calves and pigs, at the pleasure of their owners; with no right or power to protect their own virtue, kept in the lowest ignorance and degradation, and often compelled to toil in the field under the lash of a brutal overseer? Were these men awake at last to "the dangers that threatened the female character" while these infamous crimes were tolerated? Oh, no! Their tender sensibilities were aroused by the appalling fact that two educated and refined Christian women had come to Massachusetts to expose these crimes, and to entreat their sisters to do what they could to prevent them! In this terrible phenomenon they saw ground for serious apprehension lest the natural delicacy of womanhood should be impaired! Of course they were in favor of all proper forms of activity on the part of woman. In "unobtrusive and private" ways she might exert a "softening influence on man's opinions." She might teach in the Sunday school, and "lead religious inquirers" to her pro-slavery "pastor for instruction." But she must not transcend the "modesty of her sex." "We cannot but regret," the parish popes go on to say, "the mistaken conduct of those who encourage females to bear an obtrusive and ostentatious part in measures of reform, and countenance any of the sex who so far forget themselves as to itinerate in the character of public lecturers and teachers." "Itinerate!" how shocking! If they would only settle over a parish, it would not be so bad. "We especially deplore," said these nicely scrupulous guardians of female purity, "the intimate acquaintance and promiscuous conversation of females with regard to things 'which ought not to be named,' by which that delicacy which is the charm of domestic life, and which constitutes the true influence of woman in society, is consumed, and the way opened, as we apprehend, for degeneracy and ruin." The unblushing licentiousness of the slave system gave them not the least concern; but that the iniquity should be exposed to the women of Massachusetts, in such language as refined Christian ladies know how to use, was more than the tender sensibilities of these ministers, who claimed to be commissioned of God and to speak in the name of the Holy Ghost, could bear!

Strange as it now seems, scores of churches or vestries that might otherwise have been opened to the sisters Grimké were now rigidly closed. In some instances men, and women too, who had acted with the Abolitionists, bowed their necks under the yoke imposed upon them by their pro-slavery pastors, and thenceforth closed their ears to the cry of suffering humanity. It was a compensation for this melancholy blindness and subserviency to hear the ringing voice of Whittier in lines worthy of the occasion:—

- “So this is all — the utmost reach
 Of priestly power the mind to fetter!
 When laymen think, when women preach,
 A ‘war of words’ — a ‘Pastoral Letter!’
 Now, shame upon ye, parish Popes!
 Was it thus with those, your predecessors,
 Who sealed with racks, and fire, and ropes
 Their loving-kindness to transgressors?”
- “A ‘Pastoral Letter,’ grave and dull!
 Alas! in hoof and horns and features,
 How different is your Brookfield bull
 From him who thunders from St. Peter’s!
 Your pastoral rights and powers from harm,
 Think ye, can words alone preserve them?
 Your wiser fathers taught the arm
 And sword of temporal power to serve them.

- “Your fathers dealt not as ye deal
 With ‘non-professing’ frantic teachers;
 They bored the tongue with red-hot steel,
 And flayed the backs of ‘female preachers.’
 Old Newbury, had her fields a tongue,
 And Salem’s streets could tell their story
 Of fainting woman dragged along,
 Gashed by the whip, accursed and gory!
- “And will ye ask me why this taunt
 Of memories sacred from the scorner?
 And why, with reckless hand, I plant
 A nettle on the graves ye honor?”

Not to reproach New England's dead
 This record from the past I summon,
 Of manhood to the scaffold led,
 And suffering and heroic woman.

"No, for yourselves alone I turn
 The pages of intolerance over,
 That, in their spirit, dark and stern,
 Ye haply may your own discover!
 For, if ye claim the 'pastoral right'
 To silence Freedom's voice of warning,
 And from your precincts shut the light
 Of Freedom's day around ye dawning;

"If, when an earthquake voice of power,
 And signs in earth and heaven, are showing
 That forth in its appointed hour
 The Spirit of the Lord is going;
 And, with that Spirit, Freedom's light
 On kindred, tongue, and people breaking,
 Whose slumbering millions, at the sight,
 In glory and in strength are waking;

"When for the sighing of the poor,
 And for the needy, God hath risen,
 And chains are breaking, and a door
 Is opening for the souls in prison;
 If then ye would, with puny hands,
 Afrest the very work of Heaven,
 And bind anew the evil bands
 Which God's right arm of power hath riven;

"What marvel that, in many a mind,
 Those darker deeds of bigot madness
 Are closely with your own combined,
 Yet 'less in anger than in sadness'?
 What marvel, if the people learn
 To claim the right of free opinion?
 What marvel, if at times they spurn
 The ancient yoke of your dominion?

"But ye, who scorn the thrilling tale
 Of Carolina's high-souled daughters,
 Which echoes here the mournful wail
 Of sorrow from Edisto's waters,
 Close while ye may the public ear,
 With malice vex, with slander wound them;
 The pure and good shall throng to hear,
 And tried and manly hearts surround them.

“O, ever may the Power which led
 Their way to such a fiery trial,
 And strengthened womanhood to tread
 The wine-press of such self-denial,
 Be round them in an evil land,
 With wisdom and with strength from heaven,
 With Miriam’s voice and Judith’s hand,
 And Deborah’s song, for triumph given!

“And what are ye who strive with God
 Against the ark of his salvation,
 Moved by the breath of prayer abroad,
 With blessings for a dying nation?
 What, but the stubble and the hay
 To perish, even as flax consuming,
 With all that bars his glorious way,
 Before the brightness of his coming?”

Whether the attempt of the leading Congregational clergy of Massachusetts, under a direct and most audacious assumption of power from God, to exclude from their parishes the light of heaven upon the guilt and danger of American slavery, was a less revolting crime against Liberty than the efforts of statesmen and politicians to put down the anti-slavery agitation by statutory enactments, or than the alliance of “gentlemen of property and standing” with the mobocratic elements of the country to effect the same object, let the reader judge for himself. And let it be remembered that, of the men who committed that crime, not one ever lost, on that account, his standing in his denomination. “Southside” Adams, the author of the “Pastoral Letter,” though he served the cause of slavery with a willing mind until it was overthrown by war, was honored in his death as a saint “without spot or wrinkle,” and that, too, by men of strong anti-slavery professions! The Rev. Dr. Nathan Lord, also, President of Dartmouth College, while enjoying the uninterrupted fellowship of his denomination, was permitted for twenty years or more to teach the young men under his care (New England boys, some of them candidates for the Christian ministry!) that “slavery is an institution of God according to natural religion," and "a positive institution of revealed religion." If he had swerved but a hair's-breadth from any doctrine of the Orthodox scheme of theology, the churches would speedily have found a way of ejecting him from his chair; but as he only covered a great national crime with the mantle of Christianity, he was left undisturbed for a score of years as a teacher of practical atheism in a New England college. The men who extended the right hand of Christian fellowship to Doctors Adams and Lord while they lived (taking no note of their pro-slavery attitude and utterances as of any account), and canonized them in death, made the air of New England hot for years with denunciations of Garrison and other faithful friends of the slave, as infidels! These facts are wormwood and gall, but there is no bitterness in my statement of them — only a feeble effort to set them in their true light, that generations to come may know amidst what darkness and against what odds the Abolitionists of the United States fought their battle.

There is an incident in the career of "Southside" Adams, which, as I shall not have occasion to refer to him again, may as well be told here. It is certainly too good to be lost. In 1854 he conceived the idea that "the Northern antagonism to slavery" might be "diverted into a mutual effort with the South to plan for the good of the African race;" and thus "effectually supersede the present bitter abolition feeling and measures." The pro-slavery divines, though intensely opposed to immediate emancipation, often prated in a vague way of their anxiety to do something "for the good of the African race." The slaves, for all them, might perish in their chains, but "the African race" commanded their sympathy. Dr. Adams in meditating upon his scheme, was so fascinated that he resolved to attempt its execution. He was sure that the dear slaveholders, who had been so much abused by the Abolitionists, would respond to his wishes most heartily; and so he sent to a number of them in different States a series of mild interrogatories, which he begged them to answer. Among the Southern men thus addressed, and whose aid Dr. Adams fondly hoped to secure in furtherance of his most benevolent scheme, was the Hon. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia. Mr. Wise replied in a letter which first met the eye of the Doctor in a public journal. It contained this passage, from which the spirit of the whole may be safely inferred:—

“What business have you to interest yourself about it [slavery]? Why take a thought about benefiting the race of my slave, more than about benefiting the race of my ox or my ass, or anything else that is mine?”

This was certainly a poser. What answer the Doctor made, if any, I know not; but if Mr. Wise had watched the course of the great body of the Northern clergy on the slavery question, he might with good reason have inferred that they cared as little for the slave as they did for the ox, or the ass, or any other of the slaveholder's chattels. The Richmond “Enquirer” gave the Doctor this bit of instruction:—

“Mr. Adams's hope of handling slavery with silk gloves, and of bringing slaveholders to tolerate the mildest possible opposition to slavery, is a fallacy. Mr. Wise is as fierce on Mr. Adams as he is on Mr. Garrison; and that man must be a veritable verigreen who dreams of pleasing slaveholders, either in church or state, by any method but that of letting slavery alone.”

And yet, after this snub, Dr. Adams went on with his “Southside View,” and probably remained “a veritable verigreen” to the day of his death.

But “Carolina's high-souled daughters” found work enough to do in Massachusetts, in spite of the “Brookfield Bull." There were churches and even ministers in the State who did not acknowledge the Divine jurisdiction of the "parish popes," and were not unwilling that women, possessing the proper qualifications, should plead the cause of the slave. The proscribed women were heard in more than fifty cities and towns, and did not once fail to make a powerful moral impression. Angelina spoke several times in the "Odeon," in Boston, to large and deeply interested crowds, and in the spring she addressed a Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature in the Representatives' Hall, having among her hearers many of the most eminent citizens of the State, ladies as well as gentlemen. Her public labors in the cause, and those of her sister as well, ended with her marriage to Theodore D. Weld in May, 1838. The elder sister died some years since. Mrs. Weld's earthly life closed only a few days before these pages were written. Her memory will be fondly cherished by all who have any knowledge of her character or of the work she did for the slave.

XVI.

The Woman Question — The New England Convention Admits Women — Mr. Garrison's "Heresies" — The Clerical Appeal — A Confession — Attempts to Narrow the Platform — Sectarian Assumptions — Whittier's Testimony — Catholicity of the Movement — The Peace Discussion and its Fruits — Attempt to Revolutionize the Massachusetts Society — A New Paper — "New Organization" — Mrs. Chapman's History, "Right and Wrong in Massachusetts."

THE events recorded in the preceding chapter set the Abolitionists of Massachusetts to thinking upon two subjects — the rights of women and the assumptions of divine authority on the part of the clergy — the first of these particularly. It was soon discovered that the constitutions of the anti-slavery societies admitted to membership "any person" who accepted their principles and contributed to their funds; and as, from the beginning, women had done much of the work of the societies, in circulating petitions, collecting funds, etc., their right to full membership, to vote and speak, if they wished, was generally regarded as unquestionable. Many excellent women, perceiving this, were more than willing to avail themselves of their constitutional rights. So strong did this sentiment become, that the New England Convention of 1838 adopted this resolution:—

"Resolved, That all persons present, or who may be present at subsequent meetings, whether men or women, who agree with us in sentiment on the subject of slavery, be invited to become members, and participate in the proceedings of the Convention."

It was adopted without a single negative vote. A very large number, if not a majority, of those who voted for it were persons holding evangelical sentiments, who desired in this way to express their contempt for the "Brookfield Bull." Eight orthodox clergymen, however, immediately removed their names from the roll of the Convention, and eight others remained to protest against the introduction of a topic which they said was foreign to the platform. The majority, however, insisted that they had taken no action, and should take none, upon any question of woman's rights, except so far as to recognize her right of membership in the anti-slavery societies. They had simply acknowledged her to be a "person," within the meaning of that term as used in the anti-slavery constitutions, and resolved to treat her accordingly. The question, they insisted, had not been arbitrarily foisted upon the Convention; but had come up of itself, in the natural course of events, and it was a duty to decide it promptly and justly. When noble women wished to join our ranks, we could not beat them back in deference to conventional usages or sectarian prejudices, which, in their nature, were evanescent. We simply left them free to act with greater or less publicity, according to their own individual convictions. It was not for us to define their sphere; to do so would be a usurpation. We assumed that they were competent to take care of themselves, and needed not that we should put them under any restrictions.

The local anti-slavery societies in Massachusetts quickly followed the example of the New England Convention, as the State society also did at its next meeting; and thus our movement there was put upon the broad ground of equal rights, without regard to sex. There was no desire or intention on the part of those who took this step to embarrass or annoy their stricter brethren; still less was there a purpose to drive them out of the ranks. We felt sure that, after the first excitement was over, they would be reconciled to so reasonable and inevitable a change, which we did not doubt would vindicate itself by the happiest results. But there is nothing more obstinate than prejudice, and, when fortified by a dash of temper, it does not readily yield to argument. The press was clamorous in its denunciation of the new "fanaticism," and the pro-slavery clergy attacked us on all hands as having openly repudiated the authority of the Scriptures, and cast contempt upon the Apostle Paul. They urged all this vehemently, in the hope of creating a division in our ranks, which they thought might prove fatal to our movement. Orthodox Abolitionists, and ministers especially, were harried worse than before, and charged by their brethren with lending aid to a movement tending directly to unsettle the foundations of social life, and disturb the faith of the young in the infallibility of the Bible. Great use was made of the fact that Mr. Garrison was no longer so orthodox as he had been. His views of the Sabbath, though in substantial accord with those of Luther and Calvin and many others of the orthodox school, were denounced as dangerous, while it was more than suspected that his views upon some other subjects were not such as would pass muster at Andover. True, they could not allege that he had ever introduced his peculiar religious opinions, whatever they might be, in anti-slavery meetings; but he did sometimes introduce them, incidentally, in "The Liberator," which, being his own property and the organ of no society, he did not confine exclusively to the discussion of slavery. Then there was his doctrine of non-resistance, which was said to be turning the heads of many people, and unfitting them for political opposition to slavery. Then, again, an appeal was made to orthodox prejudices on the ground that some of the persons most prominent in the anti-slavery ranks were Unitarians, while others had departed still farther from "sound views." Members of orthodox flocks were constantly warned of the danger of associating with such men, and entreated to withdraw themselves before making shipwreck of the faith. In some instances hints were thrown out that if Garrison could only be put out of the way, the clergy would take the lead in organizing a new anti-slavery movement, effectually guarded against the intrusion of men of unsound opinions.

No one who understands the force of religious prejudices and fears will wonder that some excellent people in our ranks were much perplexed by all this clamor, insomuch that they began to waver in their allegiance to the cause as then organized. Far be it from me to impeach their motives. It is no disgrace to a man to love his church or to seek its peace and security when he believes it to have been Divinely founded. These men were simply bewildered. They did not comprehend the breadth of the anti-slavery platform, nor do justice to the spirit and purposes of their more liberal associates. For the slave's sake they desired to secure the co-operation of the great body of the church and ministry in the anti-slavery cause, and to accomplish so important an object it was right for them to take any reasonable and honorable step. But they had no right to take up a false accusation against their associates and to turn their backs upon them, in order to conciliate the favor of men who for years had rejected and contemned the cause of the slave.

In the summer of 1837, "The Liberator," in the absence of its editor, was under my charge. During that time there came to Boston a Presbyterian clergyman from the South, who was reported to be a slaveholder and who was afterwards proved to be such, and to have uttered, in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, the most atrocious sentiments respecting slavery. "The Liberator," after proper inquiries as to the facts in the case, alluded in appropriate terms to his admission as a preacher to Massachusetts pulpits, as illustrating the complicity of Northern churches with slavery. About the same time there were reports that Dr. Blagden, pastor of the "Old South" Church in Boston, who was known to be an ardent sympathizer with the South, was a slaveholder. "The Liberator" alluded to this fact also, and called for information. Forthwith appeared in a Boston paper an "Appeal of Clerical Abolitionists on Anti-Slavery Measures," signed by five Orthodox clergymen, two of them residing in Boston and three in the vicinity. The authors of the "Appeal," taking occasion from what had appeared in "The Liberator" respecting the two ministers above referred to, accused leading Abolitionists of "hasty, unsparing and almost ferocious denunciation of a certain gentleman, because he had resided in the South," without first ascertaining whether he was a slaveholder or not. They also accused "The Liberator" of making "hasty insinuations" respecting Dr. Blagden, of making various unreasonable demands of the clergy generally, and of denouncing Christian men because they were not prepared to endorse all our measures. With a single exception, the signers of this manifesto had not been in any way prominent as Abolitionists; but as their accusations were an echo of what pro-slavery men had been saying for a long time, it made considerable stir. Curiously enough, its reputed author and first signer was a man whose habit of severity in discussing slavery was as notorious as it was offensive to the taste of his associates. That such a man was found posturing as an apostle of gentleness could only be accounted for on the supposition that he had volunteered or been selected to speak for others rather than for himself. The document was no doubt put forth in the expectation that it would prove a moral bombshell of the largest dimensions, and bring upon Mr. Garrison and the other persons marked for censure a weight of condemnation that would force them to fall to the rear, while the conservatives would march to the front with colors flying, music from a full band and a general fusillade of applause. But its accusations were found upon examination to rest upon so slight a basis of fact, that the document fell flat from the press. Mr. Garrison and the Rev. Amos A. Phelps, then the General Agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, replied to it, not so much because in itself it needed an answer, as because it offered an excellent opportunity to show the unreasonableness of charges long and persistently brought against the Abolitionists from many quarters. The signers of the "Appeal" won no following, but fell into immediate obscurity. Some years afterwards, the author, in a letter to Mr. Garrison, confessed that he had done wrong. "I feel," he said, "bound in duty to say to you, that to gain the good-will of man was the only object I had in view in everything that I did relative to the 'Clerical Appeal.' As I now look back upon it, in the light in which it has of late been spread before my own mind (as I doubt not by the Spirit of God), I can clearly see that in all that matter I had no regard for the glory of God or the good of man." This is certainly an honorable confession, and I am sure it won for the writer the sympathy and respect of those who had been the subjects of his accusations. Men so rarely honor themselves in this way, that the confession is worthy of permanent record as an example for others to follow.

It is not my purpose to revive the controversies of that day in any spirit of partisanship, or to give needless pain to any one who took part in them. My only desire is, in the exercise of such impartiality as is possible to one who fought earnestly for principles which he deemed equally sound and important, to make clear to my readers the ground upon which Mr. Garrison and his friends actually stood and the difficulties with which they had to contend. Probably the fault was not wholly on one side. It would be strange indeed, if, in fighting such a battle for the freedom of the anti-slavery platform against foes within as well as foes without the camp, there were not some words spoken that call for the exercise of a generous charity. Without impeaching the motives of others, I may at least claim that Mr. Garrison and those who rallied around him as their leader, were moved by a sincere conviction that they were repelling a most mistaken and dangerous assault upon the integrity of the anti-slavery movement — an insidious effort to narrow its platform in conformity to the wishes of men, who, however sincerely they loved the cause, yet loved their sects far more.

It was one of the noblest, as it was one of the most conspicuous characteristics of the anti-slavery movement that it invited the co-operation of every friend of immediate emancipation, without distinction of sect, party, caste, or sex. A majority of its founders were no doubt Orthodox men, but they no more designed to make their orthodoxy a test of membership, or to repel any friend of the slave on account of his opinions upon other subjects, than they thought of rehabilitating the Inquisition. If it had been proposed in the National Convention of 1833 to set up any test in order to repel the approaches of men of the Liberal faith, or even to keep out unbelievers and infidels, I am sure the proposal would have been rejected, indignantly and vehemently, by the whole body. And if no one, in entering the society, was to be interrogated as to the orthodoxy or heterodoxy of his religious faith, then surely no one, after becoming a member, could be either excluded, proscribed, or arraigned on that account. What if Mr. Garrison had changed his religious opinions, or even avowed himself an infidel? In doing so he would have committed no offence for which he could be arraigned on the anti-slavery platform, and so long as he was true to the slave, and refrained from intruding his opinions on other subjects upon his fellow-laborers when engaged in anti-slavery work, there could be no ground of complaint against him.

Now I am prepared to affirm that in no single instance did Mr. Garrison ever violate the catholicity of the platform. When he was Orthodox, he never obtruded his orthodoxy upon his Liberal associates; and he was, if possible, still more careful to observe the same law of propriety and good faith after his religious opinions changed. He only claimed for himself the liberty which he cheerfully accorded to others. If a Presbyterian joined the society, he was not supposed to put himself under any restriction as to propagating Presbyterian opinions anywhere outside of anti-slavery meetings. If he were a preacher, he was not expected to abandon his pulpit; if he were an editor, he might in his own columns mix Abolitionism and Presbyterianism in such proportions as suited his own judgment. Why, then, should it have been deemed an offence in Mr. Garrison, if, in his own paper, for which no anti-slavery society was responsible, he chose to discuss the question of non-resistance, the rights of woman, the proper observance of Sunday, or any question of theology in which he happened to feel an interest? As a matter of fact, there was comparatively little in regard to such topics in "The Liberator"—perhaps two columns or so weekly to twenty devoted to the anti-slavery cause. But Mr. Garrison would never consent to be gagged in his own paper. When an Orthodox editor, without prejudice to his anti-slavery standing, could print twenty columns of orthodoxy to two of Abolitionism, Mr. Garrison was not able to see what ground of objection there was to his printing his Abolitionism along with his religious views, in inverse proportions. Nor could he understand why a man of liberal opinions, standing on the anti-slavery platform, should be required to wear a strait-jacket, or hold himself under ban, while an Orthodox man was at perfect liberty to saturate his speech or his prayer through and through with his religious opinions. John G. Whittier, in some remarks suggested by the "Clerical Appeal," put this point very clearly. "How often," he says, "has the Unitarian Abolitionist heard from the lips of anti-slavery lecturers the doctrine of the Trinity advanced, as if no one ever called it in question? How often has the Quaker listened to the declaration, from the same source, that without the Bible the slaves must necessarily die unvisited of God, and candidates for the prison-house of eternal despair? How often have the Unitarian and the Restorationist been told that the slave and his master are both going down to that everlasting perdition, a belief in which they consider unscriptural and absurd? Have they no right to complain? Who edits the 'Anti-Slavery Magazine,' 'Record,' and 'Human Rights'? A Presbyterian, Trinitarian and Sabbatarian, who believes that a saving knowledge of God can only be derived from the Holy Scriptures. Who edits 'The Emancipator'? Joshua Leavitt, a Presbyterian clergyman, who, in spite of himself, occasionally 'sifts in' some of his peculiar views and doctrines. Yet these papers are the official, accredited organs of a Society made up of all denominations. . . . Each one who differs from the Calvinistic creed has as good and substantial reasons for offering his appeal or protest as the five gentlemen who have taken offence at 'The Liberator.'" Orthodox men, as lecturers or speakers, were never expected to put themselves under any particular restraint. They were not asked to divest themselves of their Orthodox harness and talk like Unitarians. No offence was taken if they employed an Orthodox phraseology in describing the sin of slavery and its consequences, or if they sometimes appealed to motives the force of which could be felt only by those of the Orthodox faith. If an Orthodox man opened a meeting with prayer, no Liberal objected if, according to habit, he closed with an ascription to the Trinity. But some of the Orthodox brethren, while themselves exercising this unrestricted liberty, were often exceedingly critical of the speech of men of Liberal opinions, taking offence if there was anything in what they said that did not accord with the Orthodox theology.

Against this sectarian spirit, which seemed at times bent upon either subordinating the anti-slavery movement to the evangelical churches, or breaking it up altogether, Mr. Garrison contended with might and main, deeming it contrary to the genius as well as to the fundamental principles of the organization, and seeing very clearly that its effects upon the cause could only be disastrous. If Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Unitarians, Universalists, unbelievers, Whigs and Democrats, could combine together to build railroads, dig canals, erect manufactories, and promote all sorts of schemes for money-making, without so much as thinking of their religious and political differences, why should not members of the same sects and parties join in a common movement for the overthrow of the execrable system of slavery? Why, with such a gigantic crime against humanity confronting them, and demanding their utmost efforts for its suppression, should they haggle with one another for precedence, or thrust their sectarian notions forward as conditions of united action?

Mr. Garrison's appeals for the catholicity of the platform rang out clearly from every issue of "The Liberator," and, throbbing as they did with the spirit of humanity, they drew to his side a large majority of the anti-slavery host, who were inspired by the purpose to be true to the principle so clearly enunciated. A majority even of the Orthodox friends of the slave rallied around him, indignantly repelling the accusations of his enemies, and maintaining his right, in common with others, to hold such opinions and discuss such subjects, outside of the anti-slavery meetings, as he pleased.

When the news of the Alton tragedy reached Boston, Mr. Garrison expressed his sorrow in view of the fact that Mr. Lovejoy had died with arms in his hands. "We cannot in conscience," he said, "delay the expression of our regret that our martyred coadjutor and his unfaltering friends in Alton should have allowed any provocation, or personal danger, or hope of victory, or distrust of the protection of Heaven, to drive them to take up arms in self-defence. Far be it from us to reproach our suffering brethren, or weaken the impression of sympathy which has been made on their behalf in the minds of the people. God forbid. Yet, in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, who suffered himself to be unresistingly nailed to the cross, we solemnly protest against any of his professed followers resorting to carnal weapons, under any pretext, or in any extremity whatever."

Many who were not themselves Non-resistants felt deep regret on account of Mr. Lovejoy's course, being seriously apprehensive that it would tend to lower the tone of the movement and lead ultimately to a bloody conflict. In the face of all the attempts to put the Abolitionists down by force, it had been of great advantage to them to refer to the principles of peace incorporated in their "Magna Charta;" but now it was feared that the contest would assume another and a less noble shape. Mr. Lewis Tappan was anxious to have the subject discussed. "I was much gratified,"

he said, in a letter to Mr. Garrison, "with your remarks respecting the mode in which our brother Lovejoy met death. Is it not now a very suitable time to discuss, in 'The Liberator,' the Peace question fully? It can be done without offending any of your readers; and I believe Abolitionists generally, on both sides of the question, and those who think they are at present on neither side, would rejoice to see the arguments, for and against, on the Peace question."

And yet, for following this excellent advice, Mr. Garrison was arraigned by some of his associates upon the charge of intruding "a foreign topic" into his paper; and when, in 1838, the discussion bore fruit in the organization of "The New England Non-Resistance Society," a storm burst upon his head as surprising as it was fierce. It was insisted by many that he was no longer entitled to a place on the anti-slavery platform, or that, at least, he should take a back seat. Non-resistance was held to be a disqualification for the complete discharge of the duties of an Abolitionist. James G. Birney so far forgot himself as to say of those who felt it a duty to "love their enemies," that "it would seem that the duty of withdrawing from the Anti-Slavery Society was altogether plain. Justice to those with whom they are associated, and to the slave, requires it." Strange language this to be applied, among others, to the founder of the anti-slavery movement!

A plan was set on foot by certain men to rally a party at the annual meeting of the Massachusetts Society, in 1839, vote down Mr. Garrison's Annual Report, turn him and his friends out of office, and put the society under other management. Such, at least, was the report that came to Mr. Garrison and others, and to which they gave credit. It is only fair to say, however, that some of those who were implicated by the report denied its truth. A great excitement followed, "The Liberator" sounded an alarm, and the meeting was very largely attended. Whatever may have been the truth in respect to the alleged design, by a secret movement, to revolutionize the society, a party hostile to Mr. Garrison and "The Liberator" was found to be present. His non-resistance views were made a ground of attack, and it was urged that a new anti-slavery paper was needed in Massachusetts, which should confine itself strictly to the question of slavery. The discussion occupied the whole of the first day, and the meeting did not reach a vote until nearly midnight. The result of the vote was overwhelming in Mr. Garrison's favor. The defeated party, however, a short time afterwards, established a new paper, — "The Massachusetts Abolitionist," — of which Mr. Elizur Wright became the editor. A little later, the Rev. Amos A. Phelps resigned his place as one of the board of managers of the Massachusetts Society, alleging, as his reason for that step, that "the society is no longer an anti-slavery society simply, but, in its principles and modes of action, a woman's rights, non-government anti-slavery society." This change of front on the part of Mr. Phelps, who had been so prompt to condemn the "Clerical Appeal," was a great disappointment to many, — to no one more than to myself, for I had placed the highest confidence in his clear-sightedness as well as his integrity. I lamented his course quite as much for his own sake as for that of the cause, for I felt sure that he was preparing for his own lips a cup of bitter disappointment.

Thus a nucleus for an anti-Garrison abolition movement in Massachusetts was established. Mr. Phelps and some other Orthodox Abolitionists seemed to have got it into their heads that there was a great body of evangelical men ready to espouse the cause the moment they should see an anti-slavery organization which they could join without — to use one of the phrases of the time — “swallowing Garrison.” Of course, therefore, there must be a new society; and, accordingly, the “Massachusetts Abolition Society” was organized in Boston, in May, 1839. After the organization had been completed, the Rev. George Trask, one of its members, came into the New England Anti-Slavery Convention and made a speech, in which he said: “Sir, we want the men of influence in our ranks. It is in vain that you attempt to carry on any cause in this country without them. We want the Honorables, the D. D.s, the Rabbis of the land. Now, our new organization will get them. They will come to us, and we shall give them offices. Sir, they won’t come unless we give them offices.” Mr. Trask had not, on his own account, a particle of hostility to Mr. Garrison; but he was full of the notion that “the men of influence,” whom the editor of “The Liberator” repelled, would join a society of which he was not the leader. How mistaken he and his associates were was soon made apparent. The new society did not, I verily believe, draw to itself so much as one of the men whose co-operation was thought to be so desirable and important. Their real hostility to Garrison, as the result showed, was inspired far less by any objection they felt to his religious opinions than by their bitter opposition to his uncompromising Abolitionism. The new society had but a short and feeble existence; and “The Massachusetts Abolitionist,” which was to supersede “The Liberator,” and bring the grumbling sectarians over to the cause in troops, under a new leadership, lasted but a few years, when it took the less obnoxious name of “Free American,” and soon afterwards went out of sight. “The Liberator” and the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, on the contrary, continued in the field till liberty was proclaimed “throughout the land, to all the inhabitants thereof.”

Such is the story, in brief, of “New Organization” in Massachusetts. Those who wish to see that history in all its lights and shades are referred to Mrs. Maria W. Chapman's admirable brochure, "Right and Wrong in Massachusetts," and to the papers of the day, especially "The Liberator" and "The Massachusetts Abolitionist." A considerable number of excellent, well-intentioned people were no doubt engaged in the movement, but it had its root in a most unreasonable distrust of Mr. Garrison, and in an utter misconception of the grounds upon which the clergy and the churches opposed him. So far as the latter were concerned, it was a case of false pretences, pure and simple, as their behavior afterwards abundantly demonstrated.

XVII.

The American Society in 1839 Admits Women — Strong Protest Against the Measure — Scheme for Rescinding the Action in 1840 — Struggle of the Two Parties — Transfer of "The Emancipator" — A Steamboat Excursion — The Admission of Women Confirmed — A Woman on the Business Committee — A New National Society — Its History — Its Decease — American Missionary Association — The Old Society — "National Anti-Slavery Standard" and its Editors — Garrison's Tribute to Arthur Tappan — John A. Collins — N. P. Rogers — Abby Kelley.

IN 1839 the American Anti-Slavery Society, after a long and somewhat unpleasant discussion, decided to interpret the word "person" in its constitution as including women as well as men. The vote stood — yeas, 180; nays, 140. The nays, it will be observed, were much more numerous in New York than they had been in Boston, showing that the influence of "Carolina's high-souled daughters" had been more potent in Massachusetts than elsewhere — perhaps because there an attempt had been made to silence them by an ecclesiastical bull. The act, it was understood, was not favorably regarded by the Executive Committee; but in an address to the public they said: "The vote of the Society, being grounded on the phraseology of its constitution, cannot be justly regarded as committing the Society in favor of any controverted principle respecting the rights of women to participate in public affairs." This was exactly what the friends of the measure had said in the discussion; while the opponents had sought to defeat it upon the assumption that its passage would commit the Society to the doctrines of woman's rights, in all their length and breadth. Dr. Leavitt, in "The Emancipator," not only endorsed what the Executive Committee had said, but went further in the remark that "a contrary decision, unsupported by the constitution, would have been taking sides on a question respecting which the Society is bound to entire neutrality." In view of these expressions of opinion at headquarters, those who voted in the majority hoped that there would be no further controversy on the subject, and that the minority, while doubtful of the wisdom of the course that had been taken, would cheerfully acquiesce in the decision.

As the year went on, however, it became more and more manifest that the Executive Committee of the Parent Society sympathized with the new organization rather than with its old and faithful auxiliary in Massachusetts. There was a strong suspicion among the friends of the latter that the committee in New York was hardly acting in good faith toward the society from which it had received its appointment, and that it was actually playing into the hands of the new organization, in the hope of being able, at the next meeting, to reverse the action upon the woman question, and put the whole movement into a hostile attitude toward its founder. I do not affirm that this suspicion was just; I only say it was entertained upon grounds that were thought to be tenable. The friends of the old organization, therefore, were in an anxious frame of mind during that whole year. As the time of the anniversary of 1840 drew near, information was received in Boston that confirmed them in their belief that a plan was on foot to capture the National Society in the interest of the new organization. We were assured that private circulars had been issued for the purpose of securing a large attendance of those who were supposed to be friendly to such a scheme, and that measures had been taken to enlist the support of large numbers of Abolitionists in New York and its immediate vicinity. Again let me say I do not affirm that these reports were true; I only affirm that they were honestly believed to be so. Then, just three weeks before the annual meeting, came the sudden announcement that "The Emancipator," the weekly organ of the society, had been transferred—professedly for lack of funds to maintain it longer, and for that reason only—to the New York City Anti-Slavery Society, upon the condition that it should be continued under the editorship of the Rev. Joshua Leavitt. As the paper was the property of the society, and had been published at its expense for years, this was regarded as an act of bad faith, designed to keep the paper out of the hands of its rightful owners, in case the scheme for revolutionizing the society should miscarry. Hot words were used to characterize the act, and the friends of the old organization never saw any reason for withdrawing them. It was felt that if the Executive Committee were really unable to publish the paper for three weeks, until the society could have an opportunity to decide for itself what disposition to make of it, the only honorable course to take was to suspend it for that brief period. I do not now impeach the motives of the committee; I only say, upon compulsion, as one bound to speak the truth, that they were impeached at the time, and that the committee defended themselves warmly. Those who wish to enter into the full merits of the question are referred to the anti-slavery papers of that day. I will state, however, first, that those concerned in the transaction stoutly denied, during the controversy which it provoked, that their motive for making the transfer was either partly or wholly to keep it out of the hands of Mr. Garrison and his friends. At any rate, they put forth another reason as the only one existing. Secondly, Mr. Lewis Tappan, who had participated in the transaction, writing seven years afterwards to Miss Maria Waring, an English lady, used these exact words: "The paper was transferred, not alone on account of the pecuniary difficulties of the society, but because the Executive Committee did not wish to continue it themselves, or leave it in the hands of their successors of different principles." If this avowal had been frankly made at the time, there would have been no difference of opinion among impartial men as to the character of the transaction.

Under the circumstances above described, the friends of the old organization in Massachusetts felt compelled to take some efficient measures to defeat what they thought an unworthy plot to change the whole character of the anti-slavery movement and place it upon a sectarian basis. What they did was to charter a steamer, to take from Providence to New York as large a number of delegates as might choose to attend. They put the fare at a low rate, and sent out a rallying-cry through "The Liberator" to all who desired to keep the good ship Anti-Slavery on her right course.

The call was promptly responded to. Over four hundred delegates, many of them women, went to New York in the steamer "Rhode Island," prepared to do what they could to preserve the integrity of the anti-slavery movement. A happier crowd I never saw, and surely a more respectable body of people never went on board a ship. They were all animated by what they regarded as a high and noble purpose. They were of one heart and one mind, of "one accord in one place." Songs and speeches filled up the evening hours until the time for sleep, when such as were fortunate enough to obtain berths retired for the night. Those less fortunate appropriated to themselves such portions of the steamer's floors, in cabin or on deck, as they found available. There are some people, with memories better than mine, who could tell some very amusing stories of that passage through the Sound, and of the entertainment provided, or not provided, for them upon their arrival in New York. Truth to say, the fun of the occasion was mixed with some serious annoyances, of which I shall not pretend to give an account. Mr. John A. Collins, the General Agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, had done what he could — and his qualifications as a quartermaster and commissary were of no mean order — to provide for the wants of those modern crusaders; but the quarters engaged for their accommodation were altogether inadequate, and scarcely less “dark, unfurnished, and mean” than the “obscure hole” in which Harrison Gray Otis found the editor of “The Liberator” some six or seven years before. There were no tents, and if there had been, it would not have been quite safe to set them up in the City Hall Park, or anywhere else under the jurisdiction of the New York police of that day. But all annoyances were borne with a good-natured patience that would have done credit even to veterans, and the whole company were ready for roll-call at the appointed place and time.

The anniversary of the Society was held in the forenoon in the Presbyterian church on the corner of Madison and Catherine streets, and everything passed off pleasantly enough. The only circumstance that I remember very distinctly is, that Henry Highland Garnett, then a young man fresh from the Oneida Institute, where he had enjoyed the instruction of Beriah Green, made on this occasion his maiden speech. It was only half-believed among white people at that day that a negro could make a speech worth listening to; but Mr. Garnett’s effort banished any lingering skepticism upon this point from the minds of those who heard it. The meeting for business was held in the same place in the afternoon. The house was crowded by an audience that waited eagerly for the conflict that all knew was to come. Arthur Tappan, the President, foreseeing a division, was absent, and the chair was taken by one of the Vice-Presidents, Francis Jackson of Massachusetts. The Chair, having been instructed to nominate a Business Committee, named for one of its members a well-known Quaker young lady, Abby Kelley, of Lynn, Mass., who had just entered the field as a lecturer, and to whom no objection could be made except on the ground of sex. Considering the fact that full half the members of the Society were women, whose rights as such had been duly acknowledged the year before, this action on the part of the Chair was eminently proper. The nomination, however, being objected to, an exciting debate followed, in which the whole "woman question," as connected with the anti-slavery cause, was pretty thoroughly discussed. It was the largest business meeting the Society had ever held. The party opposed to women's membership had rallied in great strength, confirming the suspicion that extraordinary efforts had been made to secure a reversal of the action of the previous year. Finally the Society was brought to a vote, with this result:—In favor of Miss Kelley's appointment, 557; against it, 451. The only mistake, if there were any, was that Mr. Jackson did not give her a companion of her own sex on the committee. Whether this was an oversight, or because he did not happen to remember the name of another woman who would be willing to serve, I do not know. Some of the most distinguished women of the Society had gone to England as delegates to the London Anti-Slavery Conference. If they had been present, perhaps Miss Kelley would not have been the only woman appointed. It is to be observed that much of the ridicule excited by the appointment turned upon the fact that one woman was sent alone into the company of six or eight men. This was a circumstance easily turned to account by the vulgar, and they fed upon it with a relish, making it a basis for the vilest insinuations. If I should cite what some newspapers of high repute said about this at the time, I should disgust no less than astonish my readers. It is impossible that a woman should not feel such insults most keenly; but Miss Kelley bore them bravely for the sake of her sisters in bonds, and thus, with bleeding feet, broke a path through a thorny jungle for those who should come after her.

Then went up all over the land the cry that the American Anti-Slavery Society had become a woman's rights association, and would henceforth, besides its other fanaticisms, seek to overturn the family relation and destroy the faith of men in the Bible. It had, so it was alleged, openly defied the authority of Paul, and thus shown itself infidel in spirit and purpose. Those who had opposed the admission of women declared that Mr. Garrison and his friends had "packed the meeting;" but the Rev. Joshua Leavitt said, "I don't think there's any room for us to talk about that." Mr. Lewis Tappan, soon after the resolution admitting women to membership was passed, invited those who had voted against it to meet in the lecture room under the church, for the purpose of organizing a new society. The great body of ministers present accepted the invitation, as did many others, and the "American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society" was speedily organized, with a constitution carefully guarded against the intrusion of women, though their activity in conventional ways, in behalf of the cause, was commended. The new society took with it all the members of the old Executive Committee, with the single exception of James S. Gibbons, a highly respected member of the Society of Friends, who had borne a faithful testimony against the transfer of "The Emancipator," and been true in every way to the old society's platform. It was curious to observe that while the pro-slavery press poured measureless denunciation and ridicule upon the old society, it complimented the new one upon its great respectability, and praised its founders for their good sense in cutting loose from Garrison and his fanatical associates. It seemed to us that, considering their source, the compliments were harder to bear than the abuse — that our side, after all, was the one really complimented.

It is not to be denied that the new society presented a formidable front, embracing in its ranks as it did Abolitionists of high standing and great popularity. It is not for me to cast any imputations upon the men who thus separated themselves from the old society. Doubtless the great body of them believed that they had taken the course best calculated to advance the cause. Many of them were no doubt sincerely alarmed by Mr. Garrison's alleged heresies, believing that it was actually his design to wage war upon the most sacred institutions of society. The charges against him were equally baseless and cruel, but for all that they may have been sincerely accredited. It was no doubt the belief of our accusers that they would speedily draw to their more conservative and "prudent" society the support of a large body of the evangelical ministers and laymen who had stood aloof because, as they said, "they could not swallow Garrison." In this respect, however, they were doomed to a bitter disappointment. The men whom they hoped to conciliate and win, however strong their aversion to Garrison, yet loved the anti-slavery cause no more than they loved him. They still stood aloof, grumbling and carping over everything that either society did. Of which of the two societies they were most afraid it was easy to see, by the direction they gave to their abuse. Some people, perhaps, may be inclined to doubt the accuracy of these statements. Let me then cite the testimony of Lewis Tappan, the founder and leader of the new society. In his life of his brother Arthur, (p. 329) he says:—

“It was said that the abolition body was largely composed of irreverent men, some of them of infidel sentiments; that their publications were couched in harsh language, that the lecturers were intemperate in their speeches; that the measures of the society set public opinion at defiance. These allegations were notoriously untrue, as it regarded a major part of the advocates of the anti-slavery reform, and with reference to the rest of them were much exaggerated. And it is worthy of remark that when the division took place and a portion of the Abolitionists drew off and formed a separate society, endeavoring to adopt such language and such measures as Christians could not reasonably object to, those who had been loudest in their opposition and most offended with what they termed the unchristian spirit of the Abolitionists, kept aloof as well from the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society as they did from the American Society, of which Mr. Garrison was the head.”

In another place he says:—

“At this time (1851), and previously, most of the ministers kept away from the anti-slavery platform, especially in the large cities. He by whom actions are weighed witnessed throughout the anti-slavery contest the enormous mistakes and even guilt of ministers of the Gospel, elders and deacons of churches, officers of ecclesiastical bodies, editors of religious newspapers and leading laymen in the churches and on committees of benevolent and religious societies, putting themselves in the scales with slaveholders to weigh down the poor slaves and their advocates.”

Mr. Tappan, let it not be forgotten, was the man who led in the secession, dividing the anti-slavery host for the purpose of securing the co-operation of men, who, as it was afterwards proved, had not a drop of anti-slavery blood in their obdurate hearts, being “like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; which will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, charming never so wisely." So much for concession and compromise as a means of reform — for "enticing words of man's wisdom" as a means of turning the hearts of apologists for sin, whose teeth needed rather to be broken by the "fire and hammer of Divine truth." (See Psalm lviii : 6.) The new society failed to gain the support of this class of men because, although it had turned its back upon Garrison, it still denounced slavery as a sin and urged immediate emancipation as a duty. It was Mr. Garrison's anti-slavery principles after all, and not his "hard language," that repelled these men; hence they would no more follow Mr. Tappan's lead than his. And this shows what a mistake it was to divide the anti-slavery body in response to the heartless clamor of such men, merely because women were admitted to membership! The good the new society did — and I do not deny that it did much — was but a poor compensation for the evils produced by the division. The seceders were never so strong afterwards as they were at the instant of their departure; they sent no agents into the field, and contributed little to increase the agitation of the slavery question. They held an anniversary, usually not half as well attended as that of the old society; they issued some excellent pamphlets from the pen of Judge Jay; and they are said to have founded "The National Era" in Washington. None of these things do I disparage; I only say that if the seceders had stood firmly by the old organization, and the united body had continued to "move upon the enemy's works" with steady and unflinching step, far more might have been accomplished than was possible to be done by a divided host. The reasons for the division, I think, were not such as should have had influence with men who loved the anti-slavery cause more than they did their sects. The new Society, after a feeble existence of thirteen years, expired for want of moral vitality. Many of its members transferred their interest to the American Missionary Association—a body of great moral value as a protest against the pro-slavery course of the American Board, and which has done and is still doing a noble work among the emancipated slaves. Others became absorbed in political measures, and lost their appreciation of purely moral instrumentalities. During the seven years immediately preceding the war, when, if ever, there was the utmost need of the highest moral influences in the warfare with slavery, the seceders from the old society were not in the field in any organized capacity. They had fallen from their elevation as preachers of righteousness to the level of political action, directed merely against the further extension of slavery.

The secession, it must be confessed, left the old society in a very crippled condition. It was strong only in its principles and in the unswerving loyalty and faith of its members. It had no depository, no newspaper, no funds. The secession had carried away nearly all the Abolitionists of New York and vicinity, so that it was hard to find there a sufficient number of persons qualified to constitute an Executive Committee. But the Garrisonians were determined not to yield their foothold in New York. They re-organized the Executive Committee with such men as James S. Gibbons ("faithful among the faithless found"), the venerable Isaac T. Hopper, William P. Powell, and others. In the course of a few weeks the abstracted "Emancipator" was replaced by a large, handsome journal, the "National Anti-Slavery Standard," started without a subscriber, and without so much as a dollar in the treasury. It was the story of "The Liberator" over again, save that the new paper was without a permanent editor, and was compelled for a time, like a Yankee schoolma'am, to "board round." It was conducted during the summer by James S. Gibbons, James C. Jackson, and William M. Chace—on just what plan of co-operation I do not remember. I only know that it was a very able and interesting sheet, and that it mightily pleased those on whose patronage it depended for support. Its prompt appearance, after what Mr. Garrison not inaptly described as "the scuttling of the old ship," greatly cheered the friends of the old society. An office was opened in Nassau Street above Beekman, and the venerable Quaker, Isaac T. Hopper, put in the place of office agent. The original design was to procure the services as permanent editor of Nathaniel P. Rogers, so soon as he should return from the London Anti-Slavery Conference, whither he had gone in company with Mr. Garrison at the close of the annual meeting. He had been for two years editor of the "Herald of Freedom," at Concord, N. H., and by his peculiar genius had made it very popular. He could not, however, be persuaded to leave New Hampshire, and the paper with which he had become so pleasantly identified, for a residence in New York; but in the autumn it was arranged that he should write for the paper every week, and that I should take the place of local editor. This arrangement continued until May, 1841, when Mrs. L. Maria Child was persuaded to take the editorship. She occupied the position for two years, giving the paper a high character and securing for it a large circulation. She was succeeded by her husband, David Lee Child, who filled the place until the spring of 1844, when Sydney Howard Gay became local editor and agent, with Edmund Quincy and James Russell Lowell as contributing editors. Mr. Gay proved to be the right man for the place, and with the help of his associates made the paper a great power. He remained at this post till 1858, doing excellent work, and commending himself to the confidence and affection of his fellow-Abolitionists by his ability as a writer and his unswerving devotion to the cause. From 1853 till 1858 I was associated with him, and when he retired to accept a position on "The Tribune," the local editorship devolved wholly upon me. I filled the place until 1865, when, agreeing with Mr. Garrison that slavery being abolished, there was no longer any need of anti-slavery societies or anti-slavery papers, I resigned. Mr. Quincy retired at the same time and for the same reason. Mr. Lowell had dissolved his relation with the paper many years before. It now passed, together with the American Anti-Slavery Society, under the management of Wendell Phillips and his friends, and Mr. Aaron M. Powell, shortly afterwards, became the editor. It was discontinued some years afterwards, at the same time that the society was dissolved. Thus, while "The Emancipator," a few years after its transfer, was reckoned among "things lost upon earth," the "National Anti-Slavery Standard," which, under the most discouraging circumstances, was established in its place as the organ of the original American Anti-Slavery Society, lived, together with that society, to record the death of American slavery and the enfranchisement of its victims. "New Organization" was certainly not a success. Making a formidable show in the beginning, it dwindled year by year, and died long before the abolition of slavery; while "old organization," fearfully crippled as it was by the secession, lost neither heart nor hope; but, standing upon the original foundation, working on the old plan, and seeking the co-operation of all the friends of immediate emancipation, without regard to sect, party or sex, remained in the field to the very end, fighting the enemy with constantly increasing energy and power, and at last mingling its shouts of victory with those of four millions of ransomed slaves.

I have now told the story of the great division in the anti-slavery movement. I have told it frankly, as I understand it, and with such candor as is possible to one who was an earnest actor in the controversy, but who has no enmities to gratify, and no reproaches to visit upon anybody. I have dwelt upon the main features of the case, entering only into such details as were necessary to a clear understanding of the main event. I would gladly have avoided the subject, but it was impossible. I have always believed that many of those who took part in the secession regretted it afterwards, seeing the mistaken impressions upon which they acted, in respect to Mr. Garrison on the one hand, and on the other in regard to those whose support of the cause they so much desired to secure. Mr. Garrison was deeply pained by the division, partly because he was himself, unjustly as he thought, made the occasion thereof, but more because it alienated from him, for a time, not a few men to whom he was fondly attached, and in whom he had long had the highest confidence. He was especially pained that a cloud should fall between him and Arthur Tappan, to whom he was indebted for his release from the Baltimore jail, and whose character he greatly admired. He never believed that the division was inspired or much promoted by him. When Mr. Tappan died, in 1866, Mr. Garrison, casting behind him all unpleasant memories, addressed a letter to one of his family, in which he spoke of "his Christian graces and virtues" as "making his character illustrious," and of his "proving his love for God by his love for man, without regard to country, race or clime;" and then he added: "At all times 'ready to be offered' in the service of God, and the cause of suffering humanity, he was serene in the midst of fiery trials and imminent perils, being crucified to that 'fear of man that bringeth a snare,' and having 'his life hid with Christ in God.' Now that the nation has decreed universal emancipation, I doubt not that he is cognizant of the glorious event, and, with the liberated millions rendering praise and thanksgiving to God."

Three persons, alluded to in this chapter, are entitled to further notice on account of important services rendered by them to the cause of the slave. Mr. John A. Collins came to us from Andover Theological Seminary at the time of the division in Massachusetts, taking the place of General Agent, left vacant by the retirement of the Rev. Amos A. Phelps. His executive power was remarkable. He did much to infuse courage into our broken ranks, to overcome opposition, to collect funds, and devise and execute large plans of anti-slavery labor. He travelled much at home, and once went to England on a mission in behalf of the cause. A man of tremendous energy, nothing could stagnate in his presence. He could set a score of agents in the field, and plan and execute a campaign on the largest scale. At one time a series of one hundred conventions, extending over several States, East and West, was held by an organized corps of lecturers under his superintendence. He came to us in a critical hour and his services were exceedingly valuable.

How shall I bring before the reader that rare man, Nathaniel P. Rogers, who was often compared to Charles Lamb, and who had a hold upon the affection of his fellow-Abolitionists such as few others were privileged to acquire? He espoused the cause at an early day, and articles from his pen, appearing from time to time in the anti-slavery papers, won attention by their raciness and striking originality of style as well as thought. He was at this time a member of the bar in Grafton County, N. H., but cared more for literature than for his briefs. The "Herald of Freedom" was established in Concord by the New Hampshire Anti-Slavery Society in 1835. Its first editor was Joseph Horace Kimball, who, in 1837, was sent, in company with James A. Thome, to observe and report the results of emancipation in the British West Indies. Not long after his return from this expedition he died of consumption, when Mr. Rogers, by the spontaneous suffrages of the Abolitionists of New Hampshire, was selected to fill his place. He made the paper as brilliant as it was able. His style was remarkable for terseness, for vivid flights of imagination, for odd and striking turns of thought, and for a wit all his own. The paper attained high popularity under his management, while personally he became a great favorite with all who had the privilege of his acquaintance. He was a man of exquisite taste and refinement, warm-hearted and hospitable, and therefore a most delightful host as well as guest. In the early days of the cause he was strictly Orthodox in opinion and feeling, but grew liberal, as many others did, as he observed how the clergy and the churches hardened their hearts against the cry of the slave. He attained at length to the honor of excommunication by a church that thought it worse to be an Abolitionist with a deficient creed than to be a slaveholder. During the later years of his life he carried his ideas of individual freedom so far that he could not tolerate a presiding officer in an anti-slavery meeting. This brought him into conflict with the New Hampshire Anti-Slavery Society, which had founded the "Herald of Freedom," and made him its editor. The publisher claimed that the title to the paper had in some way lapsed, and that it was no longer the property of the Society. The Society, however, or its Executive Committee, still claimed it. Mr. Garrison, Mr. Quincy and others were summoned from Boston, as umpires in the dispute. They decided that the title remained with the Society. It was the universal wish, however, that Mr. Rogers should continue to edit it. His health was seriously impaired at the time, and such was his extreme nervous sensibility that he took offence at the decision, and refused to acquiesce in it. A most unfortunate controversy was the result, and he became alienated from Mr. Garrison, without cause or reasonable provocation, as the latter thought and many others believed. In this state of mind he died in 1846. His estrangement from his old friends, and especially from Mr. Garrison, was a subject of general lamentation. It never could have happened, I am sure, but for a morbid sensitiveness that was the result of ill-health. This, I know, was the opinion of many of his best friends, though not of all of them. Mr. Garrison loved him tenderly, and was never for an instant conscious that he had done him wrong. Mr. Rogers remarked, at the time of the secession from the old Society, that "the quarrels of Abolitionists were better than other people's peace"; but I am afraid this philosophy did not console him in this last extremity. But I am sure that he and Garrison and Quincy are friends now. Surviving Abolitionists everywhere will gladly forget any faults of his last days — the fruit, no doubt, of nervous prostration — and remember only his noble nature, his rare endowments, his ripe culture and his consecration to the cause of the slave. It is greatly to be regretted that the Rev. John Pierpont, in his Introduction to "A Collection from the Newspaper Writings" of Mr. Rogers, allowed himself to make statements of a partisan and most preposterous character respecting the controversy between Mr. Rogers and his old friends, for which he was afterwards constrained to apologize, and which he promised to correct in another edition — which, however, was never published. Aside from this most mistaken partisanship, the book is a worthy monument of Mr. Rogers's character and genius.

Abby Kelley (now Mrs. Stephen S. Foster) was the first woman, after the Grimké sisters, to enter the field as an anti-slavery lecturer. No one who ever knew her doubted that she felt herself called of God to the work, and she entered upon it in a spirit of self-consecration that inspired the deepest respect of all observers. She did not begin in any careless or random way, but studied her subject thoroughly. She no doubt expected to become a target for the pro-slavery press, but I am sure she did not anticipate the weight of odium that fell upon her on account of the brave step she felt it her duty to take. There are newspapers that ought to be blushing to-day, and editors who should be clothed in sackcloth and ashes, for their shameful abuse of this noble woman. Her exalted worth did not exempt her from insinuations of the vilest sort. She was denounced and ridiculed by the pulpit as well as the press, and her meetings were sometimes assailed by mobs. She bore all this load of reproach with uncomplaining patience, keeping quietly on in her work, until at last she conquered her true place in the public esteem. She was a very popular and successful lecturer, and labored much not only in New England, but in New York, Pennsylvania and the West. In Ohio, and particularly on the Western Reserve, she did a noble work. She may be said with truth to have founded "The Anti-Slavery Bugle," and I doubt if the Western Anti-Slavery Society, which, as an auxiliary of the National Society, did such noble work, especially in Eastern Ohio, would ever have been organized but for her. James Russell Lowell describes her in these lines : —

"A Judith there, turned Quakeress, Sits Abby, in her modest dress.

No nobler gift of heart or brain,
No life more white from spot or stain,
Was e'er on Freedom's altar laid
Than hers — the simple Quaker maid."

It was Mrs. Foster's misfortune to be often confounded by the press (sometimes mischievously) with Abigail Folsom, an innocent monomaniac on the subject of free speech, who used to torment the anti-slavery meetings with grotesque interruptions, and who was not unfrequently removed by gentle force. The mobocratic fringe that so often hung around the doors at anti-slavery gatherings always cheered this woman vociferously whenever she arose to speak. She accepted such cheers as "the voice of the people," and sometimes annoyed us excessively by her insane talk, which, however, was frequently spiced with the keenest wit. Once I assisted in carrying her gently out of the Marlboro' Chapel. She made it a point of conscience not to resist. She was placed in a chair, and as Wendell Phillips, William A. White and myself were carrying her down the aisle, through a crowd, she exclaimed, "I'm better off than my Master was; He had but one ass to ride — I have three to carry me." Mrs. Folsom was perfectly rational on every subject except that of free speech. She was a woman of rare benevolence, and Theodore Parker and others often made her their almoner.

XVIII.

Formation of the Liberty Party — Complicated with “New Organization” — Mr. Garrison’s Opposition, and the Reasons thereof — Samuel E. Sewall and John G. Whittier — Parties Limited by the Constitution — In Danger of Degenerating — Slavery Abolished by Southern Madness rather than by Northern Principle — Moral Agitation of Paramount Importance — Testimony of Frederick Douglass.

WHILE the divisions of which I have given an account in previous chapters had their origin mainly in sectarian fears and jealousies, and in the delusion that large numbers of Orthodox ministers and laymen stood ready to espouse the cause if they could only do so without endorsing or following the lead of Mr. Garrison, they were yet complicated, to a large extent, with the organization of the Liberty political party. It is probably true that the first man to suggest such a party, and to take steps toward its formation, was the late Hon. Myron Holley, of Rochester, N. Y., who was, I suspect, as profoundly indifferent as any man could well have been to the complaints of Orthodox Abolitionists in respect to Mr. Garrison. Many of the New Organizationists, however, seized upon that movement, and used it as a makeweight to effect their ends. The organization of the Liberty party, if it had stood simply upon its own merits, might and probably would have left the anti-slavery societies intact, to pursue the work for which they were formed. It might have weakened, but could hardly have destroyed them. Mr. Garrison and others would have opposed the measure strenuously, but not in such a way as to give its friends any provocation for withdrawing themselves from the work of moral agitation. For Mr. Garrison, though himself a Non-resistant, and therefore precluded from taking any part in the management of political parties, still looked to political action as an important means of advancing the anti-slavery cause. The anti-slavery movement, first in the order of time, was before all others in his regard. It could not wait for the people to be converted to his principles of peace, but must go on in the use of those instrumentalities whose rightfulness the people did not question. Outside of anti-slavery meetings he would do what he could for the spread of his Peace principles; but on the anti-slavery platform he had neither the right nor the wish to introduce that subject. No Abolitionist rejoiced more heartily than himself in observing the growth of anti-slavery sentiment in the political parties, and in witnessing the agitation of the subject in Congress and the State Legislatures. He knew that all this was the natural, as it certainly was the anticipated result of the moral agitation created by anti-slavery societies, newspapers, tracts, lectures, conventions, etc.; and therefore he desired to multiply these agencies a hundred-fold, in order to induce the nation, at the earliest possible day, to do all that could be done by political action for the overthrow of slavery. No man appreciated more highly than he did the noble service in the cause of freedom rendered by the earliest agitators of the question in Congress — such men as John Quincy Adams, William Slade, Seth M. Gates and Joshua R. Giddings. He saw in their action the fruit of his own labors, and a sure augury of the success of the movement which he had planted. The kind concern manifested by a certain class of persons as to his consistency in all this he duly appreciated, but thought himself fully capable of taking care of his own reputation in this respect. He was no Roman Catholic, any more than he was a politician, and could not in conscience have become a member of the Catholic Church; but if that ancient and powerful denomination had lent itself to the work of abolishing American slavery, he would have rejoiced with joy unspeakable. No reproaches of the Pope would have fallen from his lips on the anti-slavery platform. He was indeed a member of no religious sect, nor would he have joined any one of all the churches around him; but not the less on this account would he have been glad to see any one of them take a position of active hostility to slavery. It was indeed his constant effort and desire to induce them all to do this. His relation to the political parties was exactly similar to his relation to the churches, and he felt no more scruple in urging the one than the other to take an anti-slavery course.

Mr. Garrison's opposition to the formation of the Liberty party was often attributed to his non-resistance sentiments. But this was a great mistake. Thousands of the most earnest Abolitionists in the land, who had no sympathy with his non-resistance views, were as warmly opposed to it as he was. Such an organization was indeed in direct contravention to numerous avowals, official as well as private, of the Abolitionists. "We have opened," said the American Anti-Slavery Society in its third annual report, "and shall open, no road to political preferment. The strength of our cause must be in the humble, fervent prayer of the righteous man, which availeth much, and the blessing of that God who has chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty." A year later it said, "It is to be expected that some political wolves will put on the clothing of abolitionism, and seek to elevate themselves and manage the anti-slavery organization, to secure their own purposes. But they ought to be met on the threshold, and stripped of their disguise. The best safeguard against their entrance is for the Abolitionists, while they firmly refuse to vote for a man who will not support abolition measures, to avoid setting up candidates of their own." Later still the society said, "Abolitionists have resolved from the first to act upon slavery politically, not by organizing a new political party, but by making it the interest of the parties already existing to act upon abolition principles." "Abolitionists," said the "Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine" for January, 1837, "have but one work—it is not to put anybody into office or out of it, but to set right those who make officers." "The exhibition of truth in Christian faithfulness," said the Hon. Wm. Jay, "appears to me to be the great instrument by which we are to operate. Should political anti-slavery ever be substituted for religious anti-slavery, the consequences would probably be disastrous."

Mr. Garrison thought, in the first place, that it was wholly unnecessary for Abolitionists to organize a political party, since one or both the existing parties would be compelled to espouse the cause so soon as public opinion should call for anti-slavery action. Their true course, he thought, was to persevere in the work of moral agitation, enlightening the people as to the character of slavery and their duties concerning it, quickening their consciences, and seeking to form a public sentiment that would impel the National and State Governments to exercise all their constitutional powers in opposition to slavery. The results then already accomplished were a demonstration of the efficacy of this method.

In the next place, he thought a political party the most expensive, wasteful, and least efficacious of all instrumentalities for moral agitation and the enlightenment of the people.

In assuming, as a body, a partisan attitude, and nominating each other for office, Abolitionists would close the ears of multitudes to their appeals, and expose themselves to strong temptations to lower their standard for the sake of political success. The purity of the movement would thus be sullied by the ambition for office, its moral tone depressed, and the day of its final triumph deferred. As a moral and religious movement, its disinterestedness was acknowledged and respected even by its enemies; as a political organization, it would be distrusted not only by its avowed opponents, but by many of those friendly to its object. The machinery of politics, he thought, was far more costly than that of moral and religious movements, and far more liable to abuse. The men engaged in working that machinery would be liable to undervalue and neglect moral instrumentalities, and thus the movement would be liable to degenerate into a mere scramble for power and place.

Moreover, he insisted that a political anti-slavery party would be subject to the limitations and hampered by the compromises of the Constitution. It could not represent the cause in all its length and breadth, its height and depth. It could only propose to itself such measures as the Constitution sanctioned, and these would fall far short of fulfilling all the purposes of the anti-slavery movement. When the National Government had exhausted its whole power in relation to slavery, the system itself would remain intact. Hence the moral movement should be kept in vigorous operation, and its power augmented by every rightful means. In doing this the Abolitionists would be taking the course most likely to secure every political object which they had in view, and that at the earliest possible day. Politicians would be quick to discover when public opinion demanded anti-slavery action by the Government, and glad enough to avail themselves of a popular issue; while as a means of forming such a public sentiment a political party was the poorest of instrumentalities. Meanwhile anti-slavery voters, without nominating candidates of their own, should exercise their right of suffrage in conformity with their principles. The Abolitionists of Great Britain had pursued this course with great success.

On this subject Mr. Garrison remained of the same opinion to his dying day. He always believed that the cause would have triumphed sooner, in a political sense, if the Abolitionists had continued to act as one body, never yielding to the temptation of forming a political party, but pressing forward in the use of the same instrumentalities which were so potent from 1831 to 1840. He was confirmed in this opinion by watching the course of the Liberty party, which receded in part from its original anti-slavery principles to support that political trickster, Martin Van Buren, and again in suffering itself to be absorbed by the Republican party upon the single issue of the non-extension of slavery to new territory. He thought there was no necessity for Abolitionists to take a downward course to reach that point. If they had remained firm in demanding of the government all that it had power to do for the overthrow of slavery, the political parties would all the sooner have come up to the ground of non-extension. In other words, if the money expended in organizing and running a political party had been employed in the work of moral agitation and in the fearless and impartial application of anti-slavery principles to sects and parties, vastly more would have been accomplished, and political action against slavery the sooner secured.

In saying this let me not be understood to question the motives of those who originated the Liberty party, or to speak in a controversial spirit upon the subject. My sole object is to make clear to my readers the position held by Mr. Garrison and his associates. Whether that position was justified or not by the facts in the case, every reader must judge for himself. Nor let it be for a moment supposed that I undervalue the results of political action, or would detract from the praise due to the noble men who fought the Slave Power by this means. On the contrary, my heart swells with gratitude when I think of the courage and devotion of Slade and Giddings, Gates and Hale, Wilson and Sumner, Morris and Chase, and scores of others, who exhausted all the powers of the Constitution in their efforts to resist the encroachments of slavery; and, above all, when I think of Abraham Lincoln, patient, conscientious, firm, waiting for the hour when, as Commander-in-Chief of the Military and Naval forces of the United States, he could rightfully strike off the fetters of the slaves, and then, by a single stroke of his pen, lifting four millions of human beings from the condition of chattels to that of men, and delivering the Republic forever from the guilt and shame of slavery. Still, I cannot forget that it was the madness of the Slave Power alone that opened the way to this glorious consummation. I cannot forget that the political party which went into power in 1861; and which had absorbed into itself the anti-slavery voters of the country, contemplated nothing more than keeping slavery within its then present limits, and that Abraham Lincoln, during the first month of his administration, diligently enforced the infamous Fugitive Slave law, in order to convince the slaveholders that neither he nor his party contemplated any infraction of their constitutional rights, and that they could remain in the Union with the perfect assurance that their diabolical system would be preserved from harm. I cannot forget that the great mass of the Northern people, including the ministers and churches of nearly every denomination, were not only willing, but anxious to have the South remain in the Union, with all their slaves, and ready to fulfil, for the protection of slavery, all the obligations imposed by the Constitution. And if the South had listened to the persuasions of the North, in all probability slavery, with all its indescribable atrocities, would be existing to-day, and the Northern ministry and church, perhaps, as indifferent as ever to the wrongs and woes of its victims. The Northern people should not take too much credit to themselves for an event which was made possible and necessary, not by any virtue of their own, but by a madness which they earnestly deprecated, and which, by the proffered renewal of unholy compromises, they sought to subdue. God, who looketh on the heart, is not mocked. He holds men responsible not alone for iniquity consummated, but for that which they were willing to do if opportunity had not failed.

Some of the best friends of Mr. Garrison—men who had no part or sympathy in the efforts to oust him from his rightful place in deference to sectarian prejudices—were in favor of the Liberty party. It will be enough to mention among these the names of Samuel E. Sewall and John G. Whittier, for whose conscientious convictions Mr. Garrison cherished the utmost respect. But he could not avoid seeing that a very large proportion of the leaders and members of that party were men who had taken an active part in dividing the anti-slavery host on sectarian grounds, and whose minds and hearts were full of enmity to the old organization. It was to him a very instructive spectacle to observe a score or two of clergymen aroused all at once to a pitch of high enthusiasm for political purity, and willing at the same time to wink at the impurity of the church; too conscientious to vote at the polls for a slaveholder or a pro-slavery man, but quite willing to remain connected with religious denominations that were in open complicity with slavery and wholly indifferent to the wrongs of the slaves. These preachers, who turned their backs upon the anti-slavery movement as originally organized, had come to the conclusion that it was time for judgment to begin, not at the house of God, but in the political parties ! It did not matter so much that slaveholders had access to the Northern pulpits and communion-tables, as it did that they had places of honor in the political parties, and held office under the government. These men had labored for years to elevate the standard of morality in the churches, and had found the task so hard of accomplishment, and entailing such unpleasant consequences upon themselves, that now they resolved to turn their attention to the political field, and give the churches a rest. Perhaps in this way they might recover their ecclesiastical standing, while keeping up the pretence of being just as much opposed to slavery as ever ; and then perhaps the clergy and the churches, after being let alone for a time, and no longer angered by anti-slavery rebukes, or worried by Garrison's "infidelity," would be able, without any expense to their pride, to work their way round to some sort of anti-slavery position. All this was just as plain as if written out in so many words, and emblazoned on the sky, for all men to read. Mr. Garrison and his friends must have been blind not to see it, and unfaithful to the slave not to expose and denounce it.

Moreover, this new political zeal sought to justify itself by arguments which Mr. Garrison regarded as a disparagement of the moral agitation against slavery, and well calculated to bring it into contempt. Slavery, it was said, was the creature of law, and could only be abolished by statute ; therefore, the great duty of every Abolitionist was to cast an anti-slavery vote. The ballot-box was the cure-all, the end-all of the whole matter. Of what use was it to talk against slavery ? To vote against it was "the end of the law for righteousness." Who ever knew any good thing to be accomplished by talk alone? Now, in the first place, it was not true that slavery was the creature of law; on the contrary, the slave laws, in letter as well as spirit, were the creatures of slavery, born of the public sentiment which that vile system had first created; and the first thing to be done, therefore, was to form a public sentiment amid which slavery itself could not live. The mere act of changing the laws, after that, would be the easiest of all possible tasks; it would follow as a matter of course. The one thing to be done, therefore, Mr. Garrison insisted, was to change public sentiment; and for this moral agitation, in other words, "the opposition of moral purity to moral corruption, the destruction of error by the potency of truth, the overthrow of prejudice by the power of love," was the chief instrumentality. The best weapons of the anti-slavery warfare were "spiritual, and mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." With the example of Jesus, the prophets and the apostles before them, not one of whom ever cast a ballot, it was not becoming in men to sneer at "the foolishness of preaching," or to doubt the wisdom of proclaiming the truth in the ears of a sinful nation.

Such were the views of Mr. Garrison. Whether they were wise or foolish posterity will judge. He and his friends believed with all their hearts that they were sound, and they acted upon them with an energy, a fidelity that overcame all obstacles, and that yielded neither to obloquy nor persecution. Frederick Douglass, after the organization of the Free Soil party, with the instinct of one who had worn the fetters of a slave, set the subject in a clear light. "We declare," he said, "that the Free Soil movement ought not to be considered as the real anti-slavery movement of the country, and our further belief, that so far from regarding our movement in the light of a political one, we should strive by every means in our power to keep it mainly a moral movement. The facts, arguments and principles with which the Free Soilers so powerfully assail the ramparts of slavery have been drawn chiefly from the repositories prepared to their hands. The ground has been deeply ploughed for them, and they find it comparatively mellow, requiring little effort to cultivate it. The party came into operation, not by its own impulse, but by invitation, and a state of preparation which made it easy to operate. Pride and self-glory may conceal it, but time will reveal that to the earnest, unwearying, and faithful toil of William Lloyd Garrison and the American Anti-Slavery Society with its auxiliaries, we are indebted for the Free Soil movement." The Liberty party set itself up in business upon capital created for it by ten years of moral agitation, and the anti-slavery parties that followed profited by the same and other similar accumulations of moral power, the fruit of the agitation which some of them affected to despise. Mr. Garrison himself did not hesitate to claim for the movement with which he was identified the credit which so many others have given it. "If," he said, "the Garrisonian Abolitionists had been supplanted or driven from the field, what would have become of the anti-slavery movement? Assuredly, a collapse would have followed more disastrous than that which followed the Missouri struggle in 1820, and neither a Giddings nor a Sumner, neither a Wilson nor a Julian would have been seen as a political representative of the movement in Congress." Possibly there may be some to whom this will read like an idle boast, but those who know how to trace important public events to their original causes, and to weigh the influences — not always those which first challenge attention — that shape the character and mould the destiny of nations, will not doubt its truth.

XIX.

Explanatory and Apologetic—The Moral Agitation, its Instruments, Agents and Resources—Bad Effects of the Secession—The Garrisonians “Hold the Fort”—The Movement Still Formidable—Pennsylvania—The Western Society—Anti-Slavery Papers—Annexation of Texas—Theodore Parker—The Lecturing Agents—Rev. Samuel May—Stephen S. Foster—Parker Pillsbury.

I HAVE now completed my sketches of the anti-slavery movement up to and including the divisions of 1839-40, treating the subject with only such a degree of fullness as it seemed absolutely to require. I must remind my readers that I have not undertaken to write a complete history, but only to present an outline of the principal events embraced in this period. Many interesting occurrences have either not been mentioned at all, or referred to only in the briefest terms. I trust I have not wholly failed in my design to give a true account of the origin and early growth of one of the grandest moral and philanthropic movements that the world has ever witnessed. It was my cherished hope for many years that one far more competent than myself would perform this task; and I consented to undertake it at last only because no one else appeared, or seemed likely to appear, on the field.

I believe I have not erred in thinking that it was above all things important to take such a proportion of the space at my command as might be required to describe the origin and foundation of the anti-slavery movement, to show what mighty efforts were made to crush it in its earliest years, and to depict the persecutions endured by its first advocates. The remainder of the history, though crowded with events of thrilling interest, will yet, in view of the strong light cast upon it from the foundation period already described, bear to be treated with the brevity made imperative by the limits of this volume. The origin of the movement, the fundamental principles upon which it rested, the methods by which its ends were sought, and the resistance it met with, having been already made clear, there is the less need of a close attention to details in what remains to be written. And yet I will frankly confess my regret, for the reader's sake, that I cannot now avail myself fully of the rich materials gleaned from a survey of the later period of the history. The broadest outline is all that I can attempt.

I must also ask my readers to remember that I have not undertaken to write a history, however brief, of either of the three political parties which, at different periods before emancipation, represented in a certain sense the anti-slavery sentiment of the country, or of the discussions in Congress that preceded and followed the Rebellion. And this not because I do not appreciate the immense importance of this branch of the subject, but because it has already been treated with more or less fulness by William Goodell in his "Slavery and Anti-Slavery" (1855), by Horace Greeley in his "Great American Conflict," and by Vice-President Wilson in his "History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power." It is my ambition to do a work which they neglected, but which is certainly not less important than that which they so well performed. The portion of anti-slavery history which received their attention is in no danger of being thrown into the shade, nor is the world likely to overlook its indebtedness to the heroes who fought on that conspicuous stage. But the fresh mountain-springs of moral influence, by which the life of the anti-slavery political parties was constantly renewed and their blood kept from degenerating, have not been appreciated as they deserve. Men indeed who live in the excitement and turmoil of political life are often utterly oblivious of the moral influences which, having no organic connection with the machinery of parties, are yet its chief propelling force. So true is this that multitudes of otherwise well-informed people conceive of the anti-slavery movement in this country as having begun either with the formation of the Liberty party or with the Fremont campaign, and as having been carried forward almost entirely by political instrumentalities. For this reason it has seemed to me important, for the instruction of the present and coming generations, to bring out into full view the self-sacrificing labors of men who neither sought office for themselves or others, who worked no political wires and entered no caucuses, but devoted themselves steadily and persistently, year after year for three decades, to the work of enlightening the people as to the character of slavery, the wrongs and woes of the slaves, the duty and safety of immediate emancipation, and the terrible guilt of those who, whether in church or state, lent themselves to the support of so atrocious a system. But for the public sentiment originally created by this means, no anti-slavery political party could ever have been formed; nor could such a party have succeeded in its struggle with the Slave Power, if that public sentiment had not been constantly fed and sustained by moral agitation, outside and independent of itself. There was more than one crisis in the history of parties, when the political agitation, but for the moral influences that lay behind it, and that were beyond the reach of politicians, would in all probability have been overcome. Such men as Giddings and Slade and Sumner and Wilson were perfectly aware of this, and often confessed it in private if not in public. Hundreds of Republicans knew it, and gladly contributed of their means to sustain the anti-slavery societies in their work. Some of them were even glad to take part occasionally in the moral agitation, by means of which the veins of their party were constantly infused with fresh blood.

I do not belittle the evil effects of the secession when I say that, in spite of that untoward and ever to be lamented event, the anti-slavery societies and other agencies controlled by the Garrisonians were still powerful enough to alarm the slaveholders for the safety of their cherished institution, and to keep the pro-slavery party at the North in a constant fever of excitement. The American Society was indeed left at first in a condition like that of a ship dismantled in a hurricane. The seceding directors of that society were men of great influence, and when they set up a new organization, the abolition forces in some quarters were thrown into a state of bewilderment, which was like a paralysis in its sudden effects. Some of the State societies, and numbers of smaller ones, never recovered from that condition. They did nothing either for the old or the new organization, adopting the policy of keeping out of a controversy, of which they were not prepared to take either side. At the time of the secession there were in the country nearly or quite two thousand anti-slavery societies, representing a vast body of public sentiment in opposition to slavery; and if the National Society had not been divided, there is every reason to believe that the cause would have made very rapid progress in the next two or three years. As it was, the anti-slavery army, which had stood in serried ranks before the enemy, prepared to give battle at every point, was thrown into sudden confusion, one division straggling in this direction, another in that, and altogether presenting the appearance of a rout rather than of an impending battle. What shouts of exultation went up from the enemy's camp! The pro-slavery party on every hand assumed that the Abolitionists had at last done for their own movement what mobs, the denunciations of the press, and ecclesiastical and social proscription had utterly failed to do, viz:—PUT IT DOWN, beyond the hope of resuscitation. "We shall not," said the New York "Journal of Commerce," one of the most virulent of pro-slavery papers, "have occasion to write the word 'abolition' many times more." But these exultations were premature. It was an over-intensity of life rather than a diminution of vital force that divided our ranks. Although the different divisions of the anti-slavery army no longer obeyed the voice of any single leader, every one of them was full of fight, and confident of its power to win a victory in every contest. The division was more external than internal. The abolition of slavery, by one means or another, was the animating purpose of all. The power of the movement, though impaired for lack of unity, was not destroyed. It still had its "quarrel just," and therefore was more than a match for enemies "whose consciences with injustice were corrupt."

The position of Mr. Garrison and his friends in this crisis was not doubtful. They were still at the head of the moral movement. It was theirs to "hold the fort;" to stand firmly on the ground marked out by the Declaration of 1833; to apply anti-slavery principles impartially to every party and sect, and to every institution and society in the land that stood in the way of the slave's redemption; to send forth anti-slavery lecturers as extensively as they were able; to distribute anti-slavery papers, pamphlets and tracts in every accessible quarter; to prepare and circulate petitions to Congress and the State Legislatures; to hold anniversaries and conventions; in short to carry on the work of moral agitation, by every legitimate means, enlightening the people as to the character of slavery and their duties, political as well as moral, social and ecclesiastical, concerning it; thus hastening the formation of a PUBLIC SENTIMENT, in whose atmosphere slavery could not live. If others had either wholly or partially forsaken this work for less onerous or more agreeable tasks, then their duty was all the more imperative. Nor were they in the least discouraged by anything that had happened. Their spirit and purpose are indicated by the words of Mr. Garrison on another occasion. "Our cause," said he, "is of God. It has been so from the beginning. Why did this nation tremble at the outset? Why were the slaveholders smitten as with the fear of death? Who were the Abolitionists? Confessedly, in a numerical sense, not to be counted. They had no influence, no station, no wealth. Ah, but they had the truth of God, and therefore God himself was on their side; and hence the guilty nation quaked with fear when that truth was uttered and applied. We have fought a good fight, and we yet shall conquer, God helping us. All the spirits of the just are with us; all the good of earth are with us; and we need not fear as to the result of the conflict." It was this invincible trust in God, under all circumstances, that drew to Mr. Garrison's side the men and women who were best fitted to carry on a moral warfare. The attempt of a recreant church and a time-serving pulpit to fasten upon him the opprobrious name of infidel did not disturb their equanimity. They knew that they were enlisted in a pre-eminently Christian work, and that if Jesus himself should appear again on the earth, it would be to give them his blessing and lead them to victory. If they were called fanatics and infidels, so had Jesus been called a blasphemer, while his apostles were denounced as "movers of sedition." It was not for them to complain that they were treated as other reformers had been in all ages of the world. To be called infidels by a church that stopped its ears to the cry of the poor, while paying tithes of mint, annis and cummin, and forgetting the weighty matters of the law, was only a compliment to their Christian fidelity, for which they should feel not shame but pride.

So far as the National Society was concerned, it was a new departure, though not by any means a change of position. The management, for greater efficiency, was transferred from New York to Boston, but the society was still represented at the old headquarters by the "National Anti-Slavery Standard," no expense being spared to make it a worthy expositor of the cause. The pecuniary resources of the society were seriously diminished by the secession, and the diversion of so many Abolitionists from the moral to the political field. The Massachusetts society remained true to its former allegiance, the great body of the Abolitionists in that State rallying around Mr. Garrison with renewed confidence and affection. They knew, as many good friends of the cause in other States did not, how utterly false were the accusations brought against their leader by busy and not over-scrupulous sectarians. The New Hampshire society also stood firmly by the old organization, and so also did the Pennsylvania society, embracing in its membership a large body of most intelligent and clear-sighted friends of the cause, among whom were noble women not a few. The Quaker atmosphere was not anywhere congenial to the new organization, being but slightly if at all infused with the sectarian spirit that led to the secession. The Liberty party, however, was not without a few zealous friends among the Quakers, the influence of John G. Whittier in this direction being powerfully felt. But a large majority of the Abolitionists in Pennsylvania remained in heartly sympathy with the old organization. The Secretary and General Agent of the State Society was that "prudent rash man," James Miller McKim, who combined an earnest zeal with great wisdom in administration. Fitted by his intellectual gifts as well as by education for any place of influence and power to which he might have chosen to aspire, he devoted himself unreservedly for a generation to the cause of the slave, rendering it service of the very highest character by his pen and his voice, as well as by his wisdom in counsel. The Pennsylvania Society was for years under the management, to a large extent, of women. Lucretia Mott, Mary Grew, Sarah Pugh and Abby Kimber were for many years valued members of the Executive Committee, furnishing in their own persons an illustration of the wisdom of the Divine arrangement in fitting women for equal co-operation with men in all the important concerns of life. Whatever the anti-slavery societies may have lost by the secession, which had its cause in the admission of women to full membership, they gained vastly more by the acquisition of many such women as those above named, who remained true to the cause in every emergency. Mrs. Mott and Miss Grew took high rank as speakers, in which capacity they were great favorites in the anti-slavery meetings. Miss Grew also rendered the cause valuable service with her pen, not only in the annual reports of the Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society, but as the editor, at different times, of the "Pennsylvania Freeman." C. C. Burleigh had done noble work as a lecturer in Eastern Pennsylvania, before the division. He was succeeded in that field by his younger brother, Cyrus M. Burleigh, who gave himself to the cause in his earliest manhood. He was a young man of the very highest character, a forcible speaker and a vigorous writer. He did excellent service both as a lecturer and editor of the "Pennsylvania Freeman," and his early death — which was no doubt caused by his unreserved devotion to his work — deprived the cause of a champion whose place could never be filled. The cause in Eastern Pennsylvania was also greatly indebted to the wise liberality and the indefatigable labors of Edward M. Davis, whose mind was as fertile in planning as his hand was in executing anti-slavery measures. Another power that wrought mightily for the cause in that region, and especially in Philadelphia, was the pulpit of the Rev. William H. Furness, D. D., of the Unitarian denomination. In every crisis of the cause his voice rang out in clear tones, in vindication of outraged right, and in rebuke of popular wrong. He occupied in Philadelphia a position like that of Theodore Parker in Boston, who surpassed him neither in clearness of vision nor boldness of utterance. His pulpit was a great light amid the darkness of the time, and to it the Abolitionists constantly turned for words of cheer and hope.

After the separation, the Western Anti-Slavery Society was organized in North-eastern Ohio, Western Pennsylvania being included in the field of its operations. "The Anti-Slavery Bugle" was also founded at Salem, Ohio, Benjamin S. and Jane Elizabeth Jones being its editors until 1849, when I took charge of it for two years, being followed at the end of that time by Marius R. Robinson. Mrs. Jones, as Jane Elizabeth Hitchcock, was the first woman, I believe, to follow the example of Abby Kelley in entering the lecture field. She was admirably fitted for the work, being an excellent speaker as well as a forcible writer. Her labors in the State of New York and in the field occupied by the Western Anti-Slavery Society won for her the esteem and affection of her associates and the respect of the community. The Western Society was largely indebted for its efficiency to the labors of Our Country is the World, our Countrymen are all Mankind.

REDUCED FAC SIMILE OF THE HEADING OF "THE LIBERATOR."

James W. Walker, for many years its indefatigable lecturing agent. He was, I believe, when he first entered the field, a preacher of the new anti-slavery denomination of Wesleyans. His heart was thoroughly enlisted in the work, and his life was no doubt shortened by a zeal which would not permit him to rest, but constantly impelled him to overtax his strength.

It will be seen, therefore, that the Garrisonians, besides preserving the National Society, had the support, during much of the time after 1840, of not less than four State auxiliaries — one of them, that of Massachusetts, having been the most efficient of all from the first — and of five weekly papers, viz., "The Liberator," in Boston; the "National Anti-Slavery Standard," in New York; the "Pennsylvania Freeman," in Philadelphia; the "Anti-Slavery Bugle," in Salem, Ohio; and the "Herald of Freedom," in Concord, N. H. The last-mentioned paper was discontinued in 1846, or thereabout; while the "Freeman" was united with the "Standard" in 1855. The "Bugle" was not discontinued till near the day of emancipation. "The Liberator" and the "Standard" continued in the field long enough to record not only Lincoln's decree of emancipation, but the adoption of those amendments to the Constitution which dissolved forever that "covenant with death" and that "agreement with hell" which they had done so much to make odious in the eyes of the people. Mr. Garrison and his supporters were not indeed formidable in respect of numbers, or wealth, or social position; but theirs was a warfare of the kind in which one is able to chase a thousand, and two to put ten thousand to flight; nay, in which one, with God, is a majority. Their movement was like a great revolving light on a headland, whose rays penetrate far out into the darkness, warning the navigator of the breakers to be shunned, and revealing the course to a safe harbor. Careful navigators on the sea of politics watched for that light and laid their course by it in times of danger. Such men as Sumner and Wilson, if they did not always agree with Mr. Garrison, took note of his warnings, which they knew were never given without cause. They read "The Liberator" and the "Standard," and were not ashamed to acknowledge their indebtedness to them for wise suggestions and a wholesome moral stimulus, such as they rarely found in their party journals. Mr. Sumner, during the twelve years that I was connected with the "Standard," never failed to call at the Anti-Slavery Office, on his way to and from Washington, to consult those whom he found there in regard to the issues of the time. If he was more clear-sighted than many others, and less inclined to adopt half-way measures, or to relax his hold upon great principles, it was in part because from the first he was a diligent reader of "The Liberator" and the "Standard," and often in close consultation with Mr. Garrison. That so many others in the Republican ranks occasionally faltered in their allegiance to the cause, and were ready sometimes to enter into specious compromises with the enemy, may be accounted for by the fact, that not having read the Abolition journals, nor become acquainted with non-political Abolitionists, they did not set their compass by the eternal stars, but were governed by the shifting rules of expediency. Again and again, as Mr. Sumner himself sadly admitted, the cause was well-nigh shipwrecked on this account. Daniel Webster, after his apostasy, spoke with bitter contempt of "the rubadub of abolition;" but the power which he would fain have persuaded himself was only a fanatical din, was sufficient to defeat his carefully-laid schemes for the humiliation of New England, and send him to his grave under an unendurable load of shame and self-reproach. If he had availed himself of the instruction of "The Liberator" at as early a day as Mr. Sumner did, he might have spared Massachusetts the pain of discarding him as one who had betrayed her in the hour of her extremity.

The uppermost question in politics at the time of the division in the anti-slavery ranks and for some years afterwards, was the annexation of Texas. Mr. Garrison was one of the first to discern and expose the plot of the slaveholders in that quarter. As early as 1837 he began to agitate the subject, and it was largely owing to his influence that Massachusetts was roused to make a stubborn though unsuccessful resistance to the annexation scheme. Lecturing agents took up the theme, diffusing light and stirring the people to action. The subject of slavery in the District of Columbia was also extensively discussed, and the doors of Faneuil Hall were opened for a meeting on that subject, at which Mr. Garrison presided. In short, whatever it was possible to do to keep the subject of slavery in all its aspects, political, economical and religious, before the people of the whole country, was done by the Garrisonians, through their newspapers, lecturers and tracts. Members of Congress, wishing to speak upon the subject, turned to the anti-slavery papers for facts and arguments, and those papers in turn spread their speeches before the people. Thus there was a genuine reciprocity of labor between those in the moral and those in the political field. This was so to the very end of the conflict, Mr. Garrison and his friends always recognizing and commending every act of genuine hostility to slavery, on whatever field it might be witnessed. If they felt, as they undoubtedly did, that their own position was more favorable than any other for efficient action against slavery, and if they sought by every means in their power to bring others to their ground, they did not forget that many of those who differed very widely from them upon some important points, were yet as conscientious as themselves, and as earnestly bent upon destroying slavery by the means which seemed to them right and feasible. The moral platform, indeed, was broad enough for all earnest workers, and all were invited to stand upon it and speak the word that was in their hearts. There was hardly ever an anniversary or other public occasion, when one or more of the invited speakers did not differ on some important points from the majority. No offence was taken if one speaker, out of his regard for the cause, criticised another. Indeed, it was one of the peculiarities of the Garrisonian movement that it kept its platform free, not only to dissenting friends, but even to the avowed enemies of the cause, if they would consent to substitute arguments for brickbats and rotten eggs.

Any account of the moral agitation of the slavery question from 1846 to 1858 would be sadly defective, which did not recognize the powerful presence of Theodore Parker. He did not accept the Garrisonian view of the Constitution, but on every other point he was in close affinity with us. He loved to speak from our platform, and never once declined to do so if it was in his power to answer our summons. He was at home there, and set a very high value upon the influence of the Garrisonian movement. He knew that the discussions of our platform contributed mightily to the formation of that sound public sentiment, without which no measures in opposition to slavery could be effective. In his own pulpit he never failed to improve an opportunity to bring the question of slavery before his hearers. His name was a terror to the ecclesiastical and political trimmers of his time, but a star of hope to the oppressed, especially to fugitive slaves, harried by official kidnappers and in danger of being seized under the shadows of Faneuil Hall or of the steeples of numberless fashionable churches, and doomed once more to wear the chain and feel the lash of slavery. The brave words spoken by him were a part of the very soul of the time, and his name will be reverently cherished when the moral dwarfs of the Boston pulpit, Orthodox and Liberal, who droned over their creeds and formalities while the nation was sinking into the embrace of the Slave Power, will be remembered no more.

Three other young preachers of the time, kindred in spirit to Mr. Parker, and equally bold in their sphere, deserve to be mentioned for the help they gave to our struggling cause. One of these, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, first in Newburyport, then in Worcester, made his pulpit a centre of light and power; the other, O. B. Frothingham, standing in one of the most conservative pulpits in the State, dared to plead for the oppressed when most of the ministers around him were silent. Mr. Higginson often, Mr. Frothingham occasionally, gave us valuable aid on the platform upon anniversary occasions. Mr. Higginson, in the dark days of the Fugitive Slave law, was foremost among those who organized resistance to that infamous statute; and soon after the war broke out he entered the army, and was subsequently made commander of the first regiment of colored soldiers called into the service. Samuel Johnson, for many years pastor of the Free Church in Lynn, bore weighty testimony in every crisis of the cause. There is yet another man, who, though he never made a public address, deserves honorable mention for long and valuable service of the cause with his pen. I allude to Charles K. Whipple, whose faithful exposures, in tracts and newspaper articles, of the subterfuges and false pretences of the pro-slavery clergy and churches were always timely and effective.

As my memory runs back over the thirty years and more of the anti-slavery conflict, a long procession of anti-slavery lecturers passes before me, with many of whom I was more or less closely acquainted, while others were known to me only by name or through such information respecting their labors as could be gleaned from the anti-slavery papers. This phalanx was the advance-guard of the anti-slavery army — its pioneers, scouts, sappers and miners, foragers, etc. — each of whom had to encounter the foe single-handed and take many a hard blow. Or, to change the military for an industrial figure, they were the "field hands," who bore the heat and burden of the day, and endured hardships and toils, especially in the mob days, which put their pluck and endurance to the proof. On the head of each one of these faithful soldiers, were it in my power, I would place the chaplet he so richly deserves; but these pages are all too scant for the bestowment of such honors. Of some of them I have spoken in previous chapters. A few others only will it be possible for me to mention here.

And first, let me speak of one who for eighteen years filled the responsible post of general agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, and a part of the time that of the American Society as well, — the Rev. Samuel May, to whose sound judgment, unwearied patience, and unselfish devotion the cause was most deeply indebted. In him gentleness is most happily combined with firmness, and a courage that knows no fear. He relinquished a pulpit because he could not consent to wear a chain, and cheerfully took up the cross of Abolitionism amid the scoffs and frowns of misguided but influential men. The agents who labored under his wise direction loved him as a brother. His contributions to the anti-slavery press, especially to "The Liberator," were of much practical value. No man stood higher than he did in the confidence of Mr. Garrison, and, when the great leader died, he was fitly selected to conduct the funeral services.

Stephen S. Foster, if I mistake not, was in full career for the pulpit when the slave's cry of anguish broke upon his ear, and touched his warm heart. That cry was for him a summons to another field, and to that summons he paid instant heed, not doubting that it was from the Master to whom he had consecrated his powers. A more guileless and ingenuous man I have never known. No saint of the middle ages ever surrendered himself more completely than he did to what he understood to be the service of God and humanity. His faith in moral principles was absolute, and he could not knowingly or consciously swerve from them in his conduct. He felt the wrongs of the slave as if they were inflicted upon himself; and such was his courage that he could face a mob, withstand a friend, or go into a minority of one without flinching. Neither his hatred of wrong nor his rebukes of wrong-doers were mixed with any dross of passion. Sometimes those who best loved him dissented from his opinions and criticised his acts; but no one ever questioned his honesty or doubted his perfect candor. His rare earnestness and sincerity gave him great power over an audience, and made him popular with many as a speaker. His coolness in facing a mob was phenomenal. He was one of the "sappers and miners" of the anti-slavery army, and ready at all times to attack the enemy's fortifications. His old friends will enjoy this humorous description of him by James Russell Lowell: —

“Hard by, as calm as summer even,
Smiles the reviled and pelted Stephen,
The unappeasable Boanerges
To all the churches and the clergies;
The grim savant, who, to complete
His own peculiar cabinet,

Contrived to label with his kicks
 One from the followers of Elias Hicks;
 Who studied mineralogy,
 Not with soft book upon the knee,
 But learned the properties of stones
 By contact sharp of flesh and bones,
 And made the experimentum crucis
 With his own body's vital juices;
 A man with caoutchouc endurance,
 A perfect gem for life insurance;
 A kind of maddened John the Baptist,
 To whom the harshest word comes aptest,
 Who, struck by stone or brick ill-starred,
 Hurls back an epithet as hard,
 Which, deadlier than stone or brick,
 Has a propensity to stick.
 His oratory is like the scream
 Of the iron horse's frenzied steam,
 Which warns the world to leave a space
 For the black engine's swerveless race."

Another member of the "sappers and miners' corps" was Parker Pillsbury, who got clear into the pulpit before the cause laid hold of him, but who, notwithstanding, came into our ranks at an early day, in time to see hard service. He carried the gospel of freedom into many a dark place. Endowed with a vivid imagination, he could set the enormities of the slave system and the guilt of its supporters in their true light. His speeches were strong in argument, earnest and solemn in the manner of delivery, and adorned with an imagery which to many was exceedingly fascinating. In many places, both in New England and the West, he was a great favorite. His labors in many fields were abundant and valuable. He also did excellent service for a time as editor of the "Herald of Freedom." I must again draw upon James Russell Lowell for a bit of genial description, the accuracy of which will be generally acknowledged: —

"Beyond, a crater in each eye,
 Sways brown, broad-shouldered Pillsbury;
 Who tears up words, like trees, by the roots —
 A Thesus in stout cowhide boots.

A terrible denouncer he!
Old Sinai burns unquenchably
Upon his lips; he well might be a Hot-blazing soul from fierce Judea, Habakkuk, Ezra, or Hosea.
His words burn as with iron searers,
And, nightmare-like, he mounts his hearers,
Spurring them like avenging fate; or
As Waterton his alligator."

As I lay down my pen, the procession moves on before me, and I see the faces of C. L. Remond, Frederick Douglass, James Munroe, A. T. Foss, William Wells Brown, Sallie Holley, Henry C. Wright (fighting "on his own hook," but always at the front), Dr. E. D. Hudson, Aaron M. Powell, George Bradburn, Lucy Stone, Edwin Thompson, Nathaniel H. Whiting, Sumner Lincoln, James Boyle, Giles B. Stebbins, Thomas T. Stone, George W. Putnam, Joseph A. Howland, Anna E. Dickinson, Susan B. Anthony, Frances E. Watkins, Loring Moody, Adin Ballou, W. H. Fish, Daniel Foster, A. J. Grover, James N. Buffum, and scores beside, — some of them in the spirit-land, others still lingering amid the scenes of earth, — to whom I can only give from my heart a passing salute of recognition. Blessings on them all, and upon each one of the unknown and innumerable host that fought to redeem the Republic and break the fetters of the slave!

XX.

The Question of Disunion — The Declaration of 1833 — The American Idol — The “Covenant with Death,” and the “Agreement with Hell” — Dr. Channing’s Opinion — “No Union with Slaveholders” — The Demoralizing Influence of the Constitution — The Claim that it was Anti-Slavery — John Quincy Adams’s Opinion — Judge Jay in Favor of Disunion — Need of a Sound Ethical Basis — Political Effects of the Agitation — The Rebellion Changes the Issue — Mr. Garrison Vindicated.

As early as 1843, Mr. Garrison began to discuss in “The Liberator” the question whether it was not the duty of the people of the free States, on account of the inherent wickedness of those provisions of the Constitution which related to slavery, to dissolve their political relations with the South. It was a startling proposition, from which many Abolitionists while acknowledging the strength of the arguments urged in its behalf, shrank back appalled. It seems strange now that Mr. Garrison’s mind did not sooner arrive at this point, and that for so long a time the Abolitionists habitually claimed that their movement had a tendency to preserve the Union. Turning to the Declaration of Sentiments — our Magna Charta — adopted in 1833, I find this passage:—

“They [the people of the free States] are now living under a pledge of their tremendous physical force, to fasten the galling fetters of tyranny upon the limbs of millions in the Southern States; they are liable to be called at any moment to suppress a general insurrection of the slaves; they authorize the slave-owner to vote for three-fifths of his slaves as property, and thus enable him to perpetuate his oppression ; and they seize the slave, who has escaped into their territories, and send him back to be tortured by an enraged master or a brutal driver. This relation to slavery is criminal, and full of danger : IT MUST BE BROKEN UP."

That Mr. Garrison could write this passage with care and deliberation, and read it many times in the course of ten years, without being aware that it was a specific argument for disunion, only shows how near even a clear-headed man can sometimes come to a new thought without quite discovering it. If the relation of the people of the free States to slavery, as defined in the provisions of the Constitution, was "criminal and full of danger," how could it be innocently tolerated for an hour? And how could it "be broken up," without at the same time breaking the bonds of the Union? The Constitution could not be changed without the consent of the slave States, or a considerable portion of them ; and certainly that consent was not likely to be given. And yet, it is to be presumed that, for ten years, Mr. Garrison regarded this striking paragraph from his own pen only as defining an obligation "resting upon the people of the free States to remove slavery by moral and political action, as prescribed in the Constitution of the United States." And it would seem that the Abolitionists, as a body, cherished the conviction that the measures sanctioned by the Constitution were adequate to the complete overthrow of the slave system ; although from the beginning they confessed that, "under the present national compact, Congress has no right to interfere with any of the States, in relation to this momentous subject." However this apparent blindness may be explained, it now passed away from the mind of Mr. Garrison, who thenceforth saw clearly that the obligations imposed by the Constitution upon the people of the non-slaveholding States in relation to slavery were immoral in their nature, and therefore not to be innocently acknowledged by them, on any plea of interest or necessity, for a single day. Of course, when this became clear to his mind, he did not lack courage to declare the truth. No man knew better than he that the Union was the idol of the American people, and worshipped by them as the source of every national blessing, the glory of the past and the present, and the foundation of every hope for the future. The Jewish nation hardly had a deeper reverence for the ark, which they supposed to be the very dwelling-place of Jehovah, than the people of the United States had for their national compact; and when Mr. Garrison, finding in the words of the prophet Isaiah a phrase happily suited to his purpose, denounced it as a "covenant with death" and an "agreement with hell" (Is. xxviii. 18), they lifted up their hands as if they had heard the most awful blasphemy. Even the religious press chose to seem unaware that the words were borrowed from Scripture, and went on prating of Mr. Garrison's "harsh and vituperative language." If any one imagines that the Hebrew prophet had any more provocation for the use of such words than Mr. Garrison had, he is advised to study the record. If the Jews acknowledged any covenant more deadly, or any agreement more characteristic of hell than that by which the Northern people bound themselves in respect to slavery in the National Constitution, the eye of no commentator upon the Scriptures has ever pointed it out. Mr. Garrison found his models of style in dealing with popular systems of iniquity in the Jewish prophets, and in Jesus and his Apostles; which accounts at once for his "hard language" and his great power as a reformer. Dr. Channing, though he did not follow Isaiah so closely as Mr. Garrison did, yet saw clearly the character of the national compact. "The free States," he said, "are guardians and essential supports of slavery. We are the jailers and constables of the institution. . . . On this subject our fathers, in framing the Constitution, swerved from the right. We, their children, at the end of half a century, see the path of duty more clearly than they, and must walk in it. No blessings of the Union can be a compensation for taking part in the enslaving of our fellow-creatures. And to this conviction they must speedily come, or the power of self-recovery will be lost forever, and their damnation made sure." If Dr. Channing had not died so soon after writing these words, perhaps he and Mr. Garrison would have struck hands in the effort to induce the people of the free States to repudiate the unrighteous promises made by the fathers, and refuse to be the jailers and constables of the slave system. Who knows?

Mr. Garrison, as soon as the truth became clear to his own mind, set himself to the task of bringing his associates up to the same high ground, and to the exhibition of the same courage that he had himself displayed. There must be no faltering at such a crisis; the truth must be proclaimed, whether men would hear or forbear. The right, and the right alone, was his pole-star, to be followed in every emergency and at every hazard. Henceforth it must be his chief business to convict the Northern people of sin in consenting to be "the guardians and essential supports" of slavery, and to bring them to a heartfelt and speedy repentance. Their dangerous and criminal relation to the slave system must soon "be broken up," or, in the words of Channing, "the power of self-recovery would be lost forever." There were, there could be, no questions of expediency worth a moment's consideration, or that could offer any excuse for delay. He began with the Massachusetts Society in January, 1844; but even that body was not then quite ready to follow his lead. He brought the subject before the American Society in May, and, after a long and very exciting discussion, that society, by a vote of 59 to 21, put itself squarely on the ground of disunion. The New England Convention followed, two weeks later, voting the same way, — 250 to 24. Then the whole Garrisonian phalanx swung solidly round to the same position, and the movement thenceforth carried aloft the banner, "No Union with Slaveholders."

Not for a moment did Mr. Garrison stop to consider what would be the consequences, near or remote, of taking this ground. Whether a multitude would rally around him, or half his old friends turn sorrowfully away, he could not, nor did he even seek to know. He saw the truth, and instantly obeyed its voice, sure, if he considered the matter at all, that the consequences could not be otherwise than good; and the result justified his confidence. If there was no flocking of great numbers to the standard, the moral power of the movement was augmented by being placed upon a sound and consistent ethical basis, where its friends could stand without dodging or wavering, and which made all weapons formed against it harmless. The time had come when it was absolutely necessary to destroy the idolatrous reverence for the Constitution which had so long been the shield and buckler of slavery, and a covert for tricksters and hucksters of every sort. Nothing could more surely promote the demoralization of a people than the "exaltation above all that is called God, or that is worshipped," of a Constitution of government defiled by slavery, and made the chief fortress for its protection. In any point of view, therefore, it was a high service rendered to the people of this country when the anti-slavery movement assailed this fortress, and showed it to be full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. In the early days of the cause, we used to wonder why Northern members of Congress who were anti-slavery at home found it so hard to keep their footing in Washington. The simple truth was that, between what the Constitution forbade them to do in opposition to slavery and required them to do for its support, there was hardly an inch of ground on which they could stand; and so, one after another, smitten by the popular idolatry of the instrument, they found no place for the soles of their feet save in the slippery ways of compromise, where they were utterly powerless to help the slave. Year after year, the Abolitionists had seen this farce played before their eyes without half understanding it; but now their eyes were opened, and everything was clear to their vision. How could men be true to the slave, and at the same time obey an oath to sustain a pro-slavery Constitution? Under such conditions, Congress became a sepulchre, where free souls could hardly draw the breath of life. If Sumner and Wilson and Hale and Chase did breathe and do noble work there, it was only because they found a way to break through the web which the Constitution wove about them, and thus maintain their allegiance to the Higher Law. That they were able to do this may have been owing very largely to the influence of the Garrisonian movement in diminishing the popular reverence for the Constitution as it had so long been interpreted, and in forming a public opinion which would pardon a breach of sinful compromises, but would not pardon a want of fealty to the cause of freedom.

There was a considerable body of men, some of them eminent for ability and worth as well as for long service in the cause of freedom, who strenuously held that there was not a clause or word in the Constitution that was not, upon a fair and right construction, in accordance with sound principles of law and rigid rules of philology, anti-slavery. William Goodell, Gerrit Smith, George B. Cheever, and Frederick Douglass also in the later years of the struggle, were of this party. Their reasoning was ingenious and plausible, and sometimes quite effective, like that of the man who has a logical way of showing that you have no nose on your face. If there is no mirror present and your hands are tied behind your back, he can convince you for the moment; but the very next time you confront a looking-glass you find your nose in the same old place. It was easy to show, if a man could only be made to forget the facts of history, that the Constitution was as pure as if made in heaven, instead of being the work of a nation with hundreds of thousands of slaves, and of politicians bent not only upon guarding the system of slavery from national encroachment, but even upon gaining for it positive protection. The fact that for twenty years that Constitution lent the national flag for the protection of the foreign slave-trade, and that during that long period the shores of Africa were invaded by American man-hunters, employed by New England capital to pillage, murder, burn and kidnap at their will, without the least fear of being called to account for their crimes, settles the character of the old Constitution so far as slavery was concerned; and when to this was added the provision allowing the slaveholders to count three-fifths of their slaves in the basis of representation, the clause providing for the suppression of slave insurrections by the national forces, and the article making provision for the return of fugitive slaves, its character became so black that the phrases "covenant with death" and "agreement with hell" seemed a label all too mild. The interpretations by which the instrument was made to wear an anti-slavery character had, however, some value as an honest protest against the wickedness of slavery, and as a method of relieving some troubled consciences. An association, called the American Abolition Society, was organized upon this basis, but it was short-lived. In comparison with this, the doctrine of disunion, revolting as it was to many, seemed reasonable and practical, for it was in perfect accordance with the facts in the case, and rested upon a basis of moral principle which everybody could comprehend. "There are some very worthy men," said Mr. Garrison, "who are gravely trying to convince this slaveholding and slave-trading nation that it has an anti-slavery Constitution, if it did but know it — always has had it since it was a nation — and so designed to be from the beginning. Hence, all slaveholding under it is illegal, and ought forthwith to be abolished by act of Congress. As rationally attempt to convince the American people that they inhabit the moon and 'run upon all fours,' as that they have not intelligently, deliberately and purposely entered into a covenant by which three millions of slaves are now held securely in bondage. They are not to be let off so easily, either by indignant Heaven or outraged earth. To tell them that for three-score years they have misunderstood and misinterpreted their own Constitution, in a manner gross and distorted beyond anything known in human history; that Washington, Jefferson, Adams, all who framed that Constitution — the Supreme Court of the United States and all its branches and all other courts, the National Congress and all State Legislatures — have utterly perverted its scope and meaning, is the coolest and absurdest thing ever heard of beneath the stars. . . . The people of this country have bound themselves by an oath to have no other God before them but a CONSTITUTIONAL GOD, which their own hands have made, and to which they demand homage of every one born or resident on the American soil, on peril of imprisonment or death. His fiat is 'the supreme law of the land.' . . . Three millions of the American people are crushed under the American Union. They are held as slaves, trafficked as merchandise, registered as goods and chattels. The government gives them no protection, the government is their enemy, the government keeps them in chains. Where they lie bleeding, we are prostrated by their side; in their sorrows and sufferings we participate; their stripes are inflicted on our bodies; their shackles are fastened on our limbs; their cause is ours. The Union which grinds them to the dust rests upon us, and with them we will struggle to overthrow it. The Constitution which subjects them to hopeless bondage we cannot swear to support. Our motto is, 'No Union with Slaveholders,' either religious or political. They are the fiercest enemies of mankind, and the bitterest foes of God. We separate from them, not in anger, not in malice, not for a selfish purpose, not to do them an injury, not to cease warning, exhorting, reproving them for their crimes, not to leave the perishing bondman to his fate — Oh, no. But to clear our skirts of innocent blood — to give the oppressor no countenance — and to hasten the downfall of slavery in America and throughout the world."

In his estimate of the character of the American Union, Mr. Garrison was supported by John Quincy Adams, who said: "The bargain between Freedom and Slavery, contained in the Constitution of the United States, is morally and politically vicious, inconsistent with the principles on which alone our Revolution can be justified, cruel and oppressive by riveting the chains of slavery, and by pledging the faith of freedom to maintain and perpetuate the tyranny of the master." The doctrine of disunion, too, found strong backing in influential quarters. "Should the slaveholders succeed," — said the Hon. William Jay, in a letter to Edward M. Davis of Philadelphia, — "in their design of annexing Texas, then indeed would I not merely discuss, but with all my powers would I advocate an immediate dissolution. I love my children, my friends, my country too well to leave them a prey to the accursed government which would be sure to follow." Again, writing to Mr. Henry I. Bowditch of Boston, March 19, 1845, he said: "Dissolution must take place, and the sooner the better. It is far more probable that a continuance of our present connection will enslave the North than that it will free the South. A separation will be more easily effected now than when the relative strength of the South shall have been greatly augmented. Hereafter we shall be as serfs rebelling against their bonds. Now, if the North pleases, we may dissolve the Union without spilling a drop of blood." Thus it looked to Judge Jay after the annexation of Texas. But he, no more than the rest of us, foresaw that, after gaining Texas, the South would bring disaster upon herself by wrenching from Mexico a still larger domain, on the shores of the Pacific, upon which she would find it impossible to plant her hateful system, but which would restore the balance of power to the North. In principle, however, his words are a complete justification and endorsement of the course pursued by Mr. Garrison.

A working hypothesis is not more indispensable to the scientific investigator than is a sound ethical basis of action to the moral reformer. The latter, indeed, dooms himself to inevitable defeat if he substitutes expediency for principle, or fails to declare the ultimate and fundamental truth. Mr. Garrison did not concern himself with the modes of political action by which the Northern people might escape from the toils of the Slave Power; he fabricated no scheme of government to supersede that of the Union. He knew that, in their individual capacity, they could at once peaceably repudiate the immoral compromises of the Constitution and cease to give support to slavery; and he knew equally well that when a majority of their number should be brought to take this high ground, they would find a way to organize such a government as their needs required. As emancipation must precede all effective effort to uplift the slave, so the people of the North must first dissolve their guilty relation with the Slave Power before they could establish for themselves a pure government. The path of duty for him was clear. He must cry aloud, spare not, and lift up his voice like a trumpet, showing the people their transgression, the citizens of the Republic their sins. Called of God, as he believed, to this work, he obeyed the heavenly voice with no concern for the consequences, knowing that they could only be such as naturally follow right-doing. "Do you ask," he said, "what can be done if you abandon the ballot-box? What did the crucified Nazarene do without the elective franchise? What did the Apostles do? What did the glorious army of martyrs and confessors do? What did Luther and his intrepid associates do?"

'If thou must stand alone, what then? The honor shall be more!
But thou canst never stand alone while heaven still arches o'er—
While there's a God to worship, a devil to be denied—
The good and true of every age stand with thee, side by side!'

The form of government that shall succeed the present government of the United States, let time determine. It would be a waste of time to argue that question until the people are regenerated and turned from their iniquity. Ours is no anarchical movement, but one of order and obedience. In ceasing from oppression, we establish liberty. What is now fragmentary shall in due time be crystallized, and shine like a gem set in the heavens, for a light to all coming ages."

From 1844 to 1861, the Garrisonian agitation proceeded upon this ground of the inherent defilement of the Constitution—"the saturation of the parchment," as John Quincy Adams said, "with the infection of slavery, which no fumigation could purify, no quarantine could extinguish." The truth was proclaimed in the anti-slavery journals, in pamphlets and tracts, in conventions innumerable, and by the voices of a phalanx of lecturers, with Garrison and Phillips at their head. But while all discussion led in one way or another to this point, no aspect of the slavery question was neglected. The movements in Congress and the State Legislatures were watched and stimulated by every means in our power. The action of the political parties and ecclesiastical bodies was carefully scrutinized, and wherever any honest voice was heard pleading the cause of the slave, no matter under what limitations, it was welcomed and cheered. The bruised reed was not broken, nor the smoking flax quenched. Timidity was encouraged to be brave, despair was taught to be hopeful. Tricksters and trimmers, men of false pretences, were alone repelled and scourged. The Garrisonian movement quickened and elevated every other. It helped to make the Republican party firm in purpose, quick in action, and proof against compromise. Our meetings in New York and Boston—sometimes in Faneuil Hall—were watched with intense eagerness and constantly increasing respect by men of all parties and sects. However far public sentiment might at any time fall short of our ground, the politicians knew that it was constantly advancing, and would ultimately reach the highest mark. Garrison led the great chorus of voices that swelled up to heaven from every part of the country, from people of every variety of opinions upon other subjects, but united in proclaiming slavery to be a sin and crime, and in demanding its immediate extinction. Grumblers, forced by public opinion out of the pro-slavery ranks, and compelled to do half-hearted service in the cause, kept up their denunciations of the founder of the movement; but those who, in whatever way, in good faith and with their whole hearts, fought slavery, recognized his power and honored him for his heroic adherence to principle.

And he, on his part, honored them, while fighting in their own way, and whether they approved of all his measures or not.

There can be no doubt that in the sixteen years immediately preceding the Rebellion, the Garrisonian movement did much to prepare the Northern people for the crisis through which they were called to pass. It taught them the folly of that superstitious reverence for the Constitution which was so long a main dependence of the Slave Power. It made further compromise impossible, and nerved the arm of the North to do and dare in the cause of liberty. If the moral influence that stood behind the Republican party in that trying hour, and which was very largely represented by the Garrisonian movement, had been withdrawn, who knows into what new depth of humiliation the North might have been dragged? If Abraham Lincoln, in the hope of thereby averting a civil war, could execute the infamous Fugitive Slave law, what might not have been expected of smaller men, if they had not felt the influence of that moral power, which, independent of any party influence, was working in the hearts of their constituents? We needed in that awful hour all the strength which a whole generation of MORAL AGITATION had developed. No whit of it could have been safely spared—least of all that which came from the faithful founder and leader of the movement.

The madness of the Rebellion changed all the conditions of the problem, and worked out the deliverance of the North as well as of the slaves by a process which no one had contemplated. But if the South had submitted to the election of Lincoln, and gone on demanding her "pound of flesh" under the Constitution, the Garrisonian movement would have brought victory by another process. It was simply impossible that the North could much longer endure the domination of the Slave Power. She must have found a way to annul the "covenant with death," and overthrow the "agreement with hell." All the signs pointed to that result. It was not in vain that the true character of the American Union, as affected by what John Quincy Adams called "the deadly venom of slavery," had been faithfully depicted for sixteen successive years by men whom no bribes could seduce and no terrors frighten from the field.

When Abraham Lincoln accepted the task of suppressing the Rebellion, and the whole North rose up to sustain him, Mr. Garrison saw at once that the days of slavery were numbered; that the restoration of the Union under the old conditions was impossible; that the slaveholders themselves had discarded their main defence. There was no longer any need of inculcating the duty of disunion at the North. He at once removed from "The Liberator," as an anachronism, his motto of "No Union with Slaveholders," and set himself to work to develop that public opinion for which President Lincoln so long waited, and which at last made it safe for him to decree the emancipation of the slaves. To those who questioned his consistency in taking this course, he said, substantially: As Benedict, when he said he would die a bachelor, did not think he should live till he were married, so he (Mr. Garrison), when he pledged himself to fight while life lasted against the "covenant with death" and the "agreement with hell," did not think that he should live to see death and hell secede from the Union. As they had done so, however, he thought his consistency might be safely left to take care of itself. As one who accepted the principle of non-resistance as taught and exemplified by Jesus, he could not himself bear arms even in the cause of liberty and humanity; but he felt it right to judge the people of the North by their own standard, and to tell them that, as they believed in war, they would be poltroons if they did not fight. Upon this point, also, he was willing to leave his consistency without defence. His own conscience was clear. He had tried to persuade the people to abolish slavery by peaceful means, warning them the while that, if they should refuse to do so, the judgments of God might come upon them in a war from which there would be no escape. The day of retribution had come, and the Northern people were shut up to the necessity of either sacrificing their own liberty or fighting for the freedom of the slave.

After the war was over, and when the work of reconstruction was before the country, did any one not an apologist for slavery dream of restoring the Union under the Constitution as it then stood? Did not every loyal citizen see clearly that the instrument must be so amended that death and hell could never again find protection in it? In the amendments which were then adopted, and by which slavery was forever debarred from the soil of the Republic, Mr. Garrison's doctrine of disunion was completely vindicated. The Constitution under which we are now living is not that which he publicly burned on a certain Fourth of July in Framingham; nor is the Union which he sought to dissolve any longer in existence. The Union of to-day is a Union "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the Genius of Universal Emancipation."

XXI.

Mr. Garrison's Visits Abroad—The London Conference of 1840—American Women Excluded—Mr. Garrison Refuses to be a Member—Excitement in England—O'Connell and Bowring—The Visit of 1846—The Free Church of Scotland—The Visit of 1867—The London Breakfast—John Bright—The Duke of Argyll—John Stuart Mill—Goldwin Smith—George Thompson—Speech of Mr. Garrison—The Visit of 1877—Sight-seeing—Visits to Old Friends—Delectable Days—Farewells.

OF Mr. Garrison's first visit to England (1833) I have already given an account. He went a second time as a delegate to the London Anti-Slavery Conference of 1840. The friends of New Organization had the ear of the British and Foreign Society at that time, and care was taken, on this side the water, to guard the Conference against the intrusion of women from America. The Garrisonian anti-slavery societies, having admitted women to membership, were bound in honor to respect their rights in the appointment of delegates to the Conference. The women commissioned as delegates by the different societies were: Lucretia Mott, Mrs. Wendell Phillips, Sarah Pugh, Mary Grew, Elizabeth J. Neall (now Mrs. Sydney Howard Gay), and Emily Winslow (now Mrs. Taylor). I venture to say that these were as well qualified for the service as any equal number of the other sex, sent to the Conference from this or any other country. But the committee of the British and Foreign Society, which assumed the right to frame rules for the Conference, excluded them, on the ground that their admission would be contrary to "British usage." Wendell Phillips made a strenuous effort to induce the Conference to repeal this rule and admit the women delegates, but in vain. He spoke eloquently, but to men whose minds were made up and impatient of argument. The Conference had been in session about a week when Mr. Garrison, with N. P. Rogers, Charles L. Remond and William Adams, all delegates, arrived in London. When Mr. Garrison learned that the credentials of the women delegates had been dishonored, he at once determined not to enter the Conference, but to take his place in the gallery as a spectator. His example was followed by the other gentlemen who arrived at the same time with himself. Seven other American delegates, who had entered the Conference before Mr. Garrison's arrival, framed a protest against the exclusion. These were Prof. W. Adam, James Mott, C. E. Lester, Isaac Winslow, Wendell Phillips, Jonathan P. Miller and George Bradburn.

Of course, these occurrences made no little stir among British Abolitionists. The excluded women were treated with the highest respect socially, save by a few of the more bigoted sort. The question of their exclusion was warmly discussed in private, and many of those who made their acquaintance were not a little mortified that "British usage" had found such an illustration. Daniel O'Connell was among those who expressed regret in view of their exclusion, and who showed them marked attentions. So also was Sir John Bowring, who said, "The coming of those women will form an era in the future history of philanthropy. They made a deep impression, and have created apostles, if as yet they have not multitudes of followers." Mr. Garrison won universal respect by his course in refusing to be a member of the Conference. As the recognized founder of the movement in the United States, he became all the more conspicuous from his outside position; and the gallery where he sat, surrounded by the excluded delegates, was a point of interest hardly inferior to the Conference itself. The head of the table, by a fore-ordained necessity, must be where McGreggor sits! Some (not all) of the friends of New Organization from America made desperate efforts to discredit Mr. Garrison with the Abolitionists of England, but succeeded only in discrediting themselves. He was treated with the utmost respect and consideration on every side, and invited to unfold, in private, all those dreadful heresies of opinion which had been the cause of so much disturbance in his own country. The Abolitionists of Great Britain liked him not a whit the less, but all the more, after listening to his frank statements and explanations. He afterwards said: "If there is any one act of my life of which I am particularly proud, it is in refusing to join such a body [the London Conference] on terms which were manifestly reproachful to my constituents, and unjust to the cause of liberty."

Mr. Garrison crossed the Atlantic for the third time in 1846, at the special invitation of the Glasgow Emancipation Society, and by advice of the Executive Committee of the American Society, to take part in the arraignment before the people of Scotland of the agents sent by the Free Church of that country to collect funds for church purposes among the slaveholders of the South. Scotland was deeply moved by the action of those agents. Meetings were held in all the principal towns, and the cry, "Send Back the Money!" rang out from the lips of thousands and tens of thousands of people. The Free Church, however, held on to the gains of oppression. Henry C. Wright, and, if I mistake not, Charles L. Remond and James N. Buffum were already in Scotland when the agents returned from the United States. They, with Mr. Garrison and George Thompson, took part in the meetings called to protest against the scandalous endorsement of slavery by Scottish Christians. The conduct of the agents of the Free Church excited universal indignation among the Abolitionists. The Executive Committee of the American and Foreign Society sent an eloquent protest, in the form of a letter to the Free Church, from the pen of Judge Jay. How much money the church obtained at the South, as a reward for the silence of its agents in regard to the atrocities of slavery, I do not remember, but it was a considerable sum. Mr. Garrison spoke on the subject in many places in Scotland, with his usual eloquence and power; but he might as well have tried to unlock the grasp of a miser on his hoard as to force out of a church treasury, under such circumstances, the gains of unrighteousness.

In 1867, two years after the close of the civil war, Mr. Garrison, partly on account of impaired health and partly to make what he then supposed would be his farewell visit to his English, Scotch and Irish friends, crossed the ocean for the fourth time. As two of his children were then in Paris, he embraced the opportunity of visiting the Continent for the first time. Crossing the Atlantic in May, in company with George Thompson, who was returning to England from America for the last time, he immediately joined his children in Paris, where he remained, enjoying the Exposition, till June 15, and then, in company with his son Frank and his daughter, Mrs. Villard, he went to London. During the next two weeks he was the recipient of marked attentions from the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, and the latter's mother, the Duchess of Sutherland, who sent for him to come and see her in the sick-chamber to which she was confined by what proved to be her last illness. Then followed, on June 20th, the great public breakfast held in his honor, in St. James's Hall, London. It was a remarkable gathering, and one scarcely paralleled. Hon. John Bright occupied the chair. F. W. Chesson, Esq., and Richard Moore, Esq., were the Secretaries. The Committee of Arrangements embraced, among others, Lord Houghton, Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, John Bright, M. P., John Stuart Mill, M. P., Thomas Hughes, M. P., T. B. Potter, M. P., Prof. Maurice, P. A. Taylor, M. P., Prof. Huxley, Goldwin Smith, William Howitt, and others not less distinguished. Among the guests were Prof. Huxley, Herbert Spencer, Prof. Maurice, Lady Trevelyan, Victor Schoelcher, and many others of equal distinction; also a considerable body of ladies, some of them from the United States, and a large number of ministers of the gospel, of various denominations. The American Minister, Hon. Charles Francis Adams, sent a note alluding to Mr. Garrison's "long and arduous services in the cause of philanthropy," and expressing his regret that he was unable, from the pressure of important engagements, to be present. Mr. F. H. Morse, the American Consul in London, was present, as was also the Rev. W. H. Channing. The Comte de Paris sent an eloquent letter, in which he said: "In receiving a man whose character honors America, I thank you, sir, for having thought of me, and for having counted on my sympathy for all that is great and noble in that country, which I have seen in the midst of such a terrible crisis."

The first speaker on the occasion was John Bright, whose address was pronounced by those accustomed to hearing him to have been one of the finest efforts of his life. It was a most generous tribute, not to Mr. Garrison alone, but to American Abolitionists in general. "To Mr. Garrison," he said, "more than to any other man this is due; his is the creation of that opinion which has made slavery hateful, and which has made freedom possible in America. His name is venerated in his own country — venerated where not long ago it was a name of obloquy and reproach. His name is venerated in this country and in Europe, wheresoever Christianity softens the hearts and lessens the sorrows of men; and I venture to say that in time to come, near or remote I know not, his name will become the herald and the synonym of good to millions of men who will dwell on the now almost unknown continent of Africa. . . . To him it has been given, in a manner not often permitted to those who do great things of this kind, to see the ripe fruit of his vast labors. Over a territory large enough to make many realms, he has seen hopeless toil supplanted by compensated industry, and where the bondman dragged his chain, there freedom is established forever. We now welcome him among us as a friend whom some of us have known long; for I have watched his career with no common interest, even when I was too young to take much part in public affairs; and I have kept within my heart his name and the names of those who have been associated with him in every step which he has taken; and in public debate in the halls of peace, and even on the blood-soiled fields of war, my heart has always been with those who were the friends of freedom. We welcome him, then, with a cordiality which knows no stint and no limits for him and his noble associates, both men and women; and we venture to speak a verdict which, I believe, will be sanctioned by all mankind, not only those who live now, but those who shall come after, to whom their perseverance and their success shall be a lesson and a help in the future struggles which remain for men to make. One of our oldest and greatest poets has furnished me with a line that well expresses that verdict. Are not William Lloyd Garrison and his fellow-laborers in that world's work — are they not ‘On Fame’s eternal bead-roll worthy to be filed’!

An official address to Mr. Garrison, from the pen of Prof. Goldwin Smith, embodying the sentiments and feelings of the distinguished company in respect to him and his labors, was next moved by the Duke of Argyll, who, in the performance of this duty, made a most eloquent and felicitous speech. After declaring that "the cause of negro emancipation in the United States of America has been the greatest cause which, in ancient or modern times, has been pleaded at the bar of the moral judgment of mankind," and justifying the interest felt in it by the people of England, he said: "If such be the cause, what are we to say of the man and of the services which he has rendered to that cause? We honor Mr. Garrison, in the first place, for the immense pluck and courage he displayed. . . . In attacking slavery at its headquarters in the United States, he had to encounter the fiercest passions which could be roused. That is, indeed a tremendous sea which runs upon the surface of the human mind when the storms of passion and self-interest run counter to the secret currents of conscience and the sense of right. Such was the stormy sea on which Mr. Garrison embarked at first — if I may use the simile — almost in a one-oared boat. He stood alone. And so in our reception this day we are entitled to think of him as representing the increased power and force which is exerted in our own times by the moral opinions of mankind. . . . We can all understand the joy of him, who, like our distinguished friend, after years of obloquy and oppression, and being denounced as the fanatical supporter of extreme opinions, finds himself acknowledged at last by his countrymen and the world as the prophet and apostle of a triumphant and accepted cause."

The official address, prepared by Prof. Goldwin Smith, was appropriately phrased, in the true spirit of the occasion, and was very warmly endorsed, being seconded by Earl Russell, who had privately solicited an invitation to the breakfast, that he might, as then appeared, make the amende honorable, in the most public and significant manner, for his unfriendly attitude toward the United States during the Rebellion. He did this in terms most honorable to himself, receiving the hearty acknowledgment of the guest of the occasion, who upon this point certainly spoke for his country. The Earl, in his brief address, avowed himself a sincere admirer and warm friend of Mr. Garrison, whom he reckoned among the deliverers of mankind.

John Stuart Mill made an exceedingly happy address, in which he enforced some of the lessons of Mr. Garrison's career. The first was, "Aim at something great; aim at things which are difficult." The second was, "If you aim at something noble, and succeed in it, you will generally find that you have not succeeded in that alone." The mind of America had been emancipated by the anti-slavery movement. The whole intellect of the country had been set thinking about the fundamental questions of society and government, and great good must be the result.

The official address having been adopted by a unanimous show of hands, Mr. Garrison rose to reply. He was received with an enthusiastic burst of cheering, hats and handkerchiefs being waved by nearly all present. His address was marked by the speaker's usually direct and simple style. He began with offering his grateful acknowledgments for this marked expression of personal respect and appreciation of his labors in the anti-slavery cause, by the formidable array of rank, genius, intellect, scholarship, and moral and religious worth, which he saw before him, and by which he was profoundly impressed. He then drew a striking contrast between the encomiums of which he was now the subject, and the odium under which he so long rested in his own country for pleading the cause of the slave. He always found in America that a shower of brick-bats had a remarkably tonic effect, materially strengthening the back-bone. But the shower of compliments and applause that had greeted him on this occasion would have caused his heart to fail him, were it not that this generous reception was only incidentally personal to himself. They were met to celebrate the triumph of humanity over its most brutal foes; to rejoice that universal emancipation had at last been proclaimed throughout the United States, and to express sentiments of good-will toward the American Republic. "I must here disclaim," he said, "with all sincerity of soul, any special praise for anything that I have done. I have simply tried to maintain the integrity of my soul before God, and to do my duty. I have refused to go with the multitude to do evil. I have endeavored to save my country from ruin. I have sought to liberate such as were held captive in the house of bondage. But all this I ought to have done." . . . "I made the slave's case from the start, and always, my own—thus: Did I want to be a slave? No. Did God make me to be a slave? No. But I am only a man—only one of the human race; and if not created to be a slave, then no other human being was made for that purpose. My wife and children—dearer to me than my heart's blood—were they made for the auction-block? Never! And so it was all very easily settled here (pointing to his breast). I could not help being an uncompromising Abolitionist." Having shown over what tremendous obstacles the anti-slavery movement had triumphed, he said: "Henceforth, through all coming time, advocates of justice and friends of reform, be not discouraged; for you will and you must succeed, if you have a righteous cause. No matter at the outset how few may be disposed to rally round the standard you have raised—if you battle unflinchingly and without compromise—if yours be the faith that cannot be shaken, because it is linked to the Eternal Throne—it is only a question of time when victory shall come to reward your toils. Seemingly, no system of iniquity was ever more strongly entrenched, or more sure and absolute in its sway, than that of American slavery; yet it has perished.

‘In the earthquake God has spoken;
He has smitten with his thunder
The iron walls asunder,
And the gates of brass are broken.’

So it has been, so it is, so it ever will be throughout the earth, in every conflict for the right.” Mr. Garrison spoke of the cause of woman, paying a tribute to Lucretia Mott and John Stuart Mill for their advocacy of that cause; referred to his visit to Fort Sumter; uttered a warm eulogium upon George Thompson, and returned thanks to other British Abolitionists for help given to the cause in America; and finally expressed the pleasure with which he had listened to Earl Russell’s ingenuous confession of fault in the position he took in relation to the slaveholders’ Rebellion.

George Thompson followed in a most appropriate speech,—the last, perhaps, that he ever delivered. There were brief addresses, also, by Mr. Stansfeld, M. P., Mr. W. Vernon Harcourt, Q. C., and by the Hon. E. L. Stanley; after which the proceedings were closed with another brief address by the chairman.

This breakfast struck the key-note for the kingdom, and other cities hastened to follow London’s example. Contrary to any wish or expectation on his part, Mr. Garrison found himself compelled to accept a dinner, on the Fourth of July, at Manchester; a supper at Newcastle-on-Tyne; another at Edinburgh, where the freedom of the city was conferred upon him,—the only American, except George Peabody, who had ever received it; a breakfast, and later a public meeting, at Glasgow. Then Mr. Garrison, with his son and daughter, returned to the Continent to attend the Anti-Slavery Conference, to which he had been accredited as a delegate by the Freedmen's Aid Commission, of which he was one of the vice-presidents. From Paris they went to Switzerland, revelling for a time in the grand and beautiful scenery of that country. Richard D. Webb, of Dublin, was with them there. They just touched the edge of Germany, at Frankfort, and came back through Belgium, enjoying a day at Brussels. Mr. Garrison was sorely tried while on the Continent by his inability to speak the language and converse with the people, and constantly expatiated on the need of a universal language for all the nations of the earth.

Two or three weeks more were spent in England before returning to America. Birmingham gave him a breakfast, and honored him by a public meeting. At Manchester he attended a grand temperance gathering, where he had a hearty reception by an audience of five thousand people. He had two or three delightful interviews, meanwhile, with Mazzini; and, just before sailing for home, he was honored with a private breakfast by a distinguished merchant of Liverpool, at which he met some fifty other guests.

Ten years later, in 1877, in company with his son Frank, Mr. Garrison crossed the Atlantic again, and for the last time. His engagements, during his previous trip, confined him pretty closely to the large, smoky cities, affording him little opportunity for sight-seeing. But now, for imperative reasons, and under the instructions of his physician, he refused public meetings, receptions, and the breakfasts of which the English are so fond, and was able to take a great deal of recreation amid the lovely rural scenery of England.

At Liverpool, on landing, he quietly made the acquaintance of Mrs. Josephine E. Butler, the lady who has labored so persistently to procure the repeal of the iniquitous Contagious Diseases acts. He became deeply interested in this cause, and bore his emphatic testimony in its favor as he found opportunity. Wherever he went, he was received with honor, love, and reverence, and found troops of friends who listened to his words with breathless attention and interest. And his private discourse was most noble, inspiring, and uplifting. Whether he spoke of slavery or war, of intemperance or impurity, of the cause of woman, or the question of non-resistance and the inviolability of human life, he enunciated the broad and fundamental principles on which are based all rights and all duties, and with a clearness and axiomatic force that can never be forgotten by those who heard him. "For three days," said a very distinguished lady, after being with him for that time, "we have heard the gospel preached." And one who met him then for the first time, writing since his death, says: "He came among us like a perfected spirit, bearing testimony." The social enjoyment of that visit was very great, as he moved about among the lovely and hospitable homes which everywhere opened wide their doors to welcome him. Delectable days were spent amid the charming scenery of Derbyshire; Oxford, the fine old University town, was visited; a rare fortnight was spent in London in meeting scores of old friends, and having two tender and long-to-be-remembered interviews with John Bright. He went to Somersetshire to see Mr. Bright's daughter, Mrs. Clark; visited Bristol, Warwick and Kenilworth castles, Birmingham, Leeds (to take a final leave of George Thompson), Scarborough (where Sir Harcourt Johnstone, Bart., M. P., gave him a supper), Newcastle-on-Tyne, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, and finally took a delightful trip through the Highlands and the English Lake District, winding up with a little run into Wales. After twelve weeks of unalloyed enjoyment, he turned his face homeward. As he parted with dear friends, one after another, he said, tenderly, as if feeling that he should never see them again in this life, "If we do not meet again in this world, we surely shall in a better."

American Abolitionists will linger with pride and delight over the record of the honors bestowed upon their beloved and venerated leader by the good and great of the Old World, reading therein the verdict of posterity, and thanking God that they were permitted to bear a part in the great struggle which his illustrious name will forever recall. One thought impresses itself upon my own mind whenever I look at this record. Mr. Garrison, in the course of his visits to Great Britain, spoke many times to great audiences, embracing all classes of the people, from the nobility to the toilers for their daily bread. He was heard by Churchmen and Dissenters, by eminent ministers and laymen of all denominations, by statesmen of every party and philanthropists of every school. On these occasions he spoke just as he was in the habit of speaking at home, never suppressing a truth which he thought should be uttered, or withholding an epithet which he thought needful to characterize slavery or the conduct of its champions and apologists. And yet it seems never to have occurred to his British hearers that he was a man of a bitter spirit, or that his language was "harsh and vituperative." They thought his vocabulary exactly suited to awaken in the minds of Christian and humane men just feelings toward slavery and slaveholders, and heard him always with delight, as a man under the sway of the noblest convictions and purposes that could animate the human soul. If any one chooses to compare the unbounded sympathy of Mr. Garrison's English audiences with the carping and grumbling of those which he sometimes addressed at home, and to seek for the cause of the difference, he has only to remember that England had no slaves, no slaveholders, and no apologists for slavery; while in almost every American audience there were always some, oftentimes many, who, if not consciously pro-slavery themselves, were yet sensitive to epithets which they thought might hit some kinsman, friend or acquaintance, whose reputation they were concerned to defend. But the faithful champion of the slave could not consent to tip his arrow with wax and draw his bow with only an infant's strength, lest some apologist for oppression should be hurt.

XXII.

Mr. Garrison's Religious Opinions—Changes in Them—No Disturbance of the Foundations—The Charge of Infidelity—Mr. Garrison in Self-Defence—His Orthodoxy—His Christian Spirit—Purifying Effects of the Anti-Slavery Movement—Moral Influence of the Anti-Slavery Papers—Faith in Free Discussion—Spiritualism.

I AM not aware that Mr. Garrison ever made any systematic statement of his religious opinions. His mind was too much absorbed in the application of moral principles to the conduct of life to permit him to pay much attention to the theological speculations which are so fascinating to many. Those words of the Master, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and HIS RIGHTEOUSNESS," seem to have been always in his mind and heart as a rule of life. He was Orthodox at first by inheritance and through the influence of his noble Baptist mother; and he would perhaps have remained so to the end of life, if the attitude of the ministers and churches upon the slavery question had not forced him to investigate certain points which he had supposed were settled beyond controversy. The first of these was the Sabbath question. He was a very strict Sabbatarian in early life, but he thought it eminently proper, in accordance with Christ's humane example, to plead the cause of the enslaved on the Sabbath day. When the pro-slavery clergy availed themselves of the popular superstition to prevent anti-slavery lecturers from gaining a hearing upon that day, he was set to thinking and reading upon the subject, and the result was a conviction that the views of the Friends in relation to Sunday were sound and scriptural. When the great lights of the American Church — Stuart, Hodge, Fisk and others — boldly asserted that the Bible sanctioned slaveholding, he was naturally led to consider the question of the inspiration of that book, and its authority over the consciences of men. His investigations resulted in the conviction that on this subject also the Friends were substantially right; that the revelation of God in man was older and more authoritative than that inscribed upon any parchment, however ancient, or by whatever miracles authenticated; and that if, as Stuart and other professors of theology affirmed, the Bible sanctioned slavery, then the passages containing such sanction could not be from God, but must be from the devil. His mind thenceforth became settled in such views of inspiration as are now quite common in Orthodox pulpits. In early life he revered the Church and the Ministry; but when the effort was made to strangle the anti-slavery movement by their authority, alleged to be derived directly from Heaven, and therefore binding upon men, he was set upon another course of investigation, and was not long in coming to the conclusion that this claim of authority was neither reasonable nor scriptural, but in its nature superstitious and hurtful; that churches, no more than anti-slavery societies, had any organic relations with God, and that preachers, no more than anti-slavery lecturers, were commissioned by Him.

These changes of opinion, however, worked not the least disturbance of his faith in God, and in those principles of righteousness, justice and truth which are the foundation of his throne. On the contrary, his faith was clarified and confirmed, as any one may see who studies his later writings. The questions raised by modern scientific investigation had no terrors for him. He believed in the spiritual nature of man, in the presence of God in the human soul, dissuading from sin and kindling aspirations for purity and holiness of life ; and he was no more afraid that this faith would die out of the heart of man than he was that the sun would cease to shine, or that the law of gravitation would break down and the universe be thrown into chaos. The Bible was to him still "the Book of books," not by virtue of any theory concerning its authorship as a whole or in its several parts, but on account of the primordial truths that illuminate its pages, and that will forever authenticate themselves to the minds and hearts of men. He did not think the injunction to love God and man, and to do unto others what we wish them to do unto us, could derive any additional weight or authority from the most brilliant display of fireworks, or even from any miraculous manifestation whatever. He read the Bible more diligently than any other book, and let its grand truths search him through and through, and feed him as with the bread of eternal life, careless of all the fine-spun theories of the theological schools. "I have lost," he said, "my traditional and educational notions of the holiness of the Bible ; but I have gained greatly, I think, in my estimation of it. As a divine book, I never could understand it ; as a human composition, I can fathom it to the bottom. Whosoever receives it as his master will necessarily be in bondage to it ; but he who makes it his servant, under the guidance of truth, will find it truly serviceable. It must be examined, criticised, accepted or rejected, like any other book, without fear and without favor. Whatever excellence there is in it will be fire-proof ; and if any portion of it be obsolete or spurious, let that portion be treated accordingly. . . . I am fully aware how grievously the priesthood have perverted the Bible, and wielded it both as an instrument of spiritual despotism, and in opposition to the sacred cause of humanity.

Still, to no other volume do I turn with so much interest; no other do I consult or refer to so frequently; to no other am I so indebted for light and strength; no other is so identified with the growth of human freedom and progress; no other have I appealed to so effectively in aid of the various reformatory movements which I have espoused; and it embodies an amount of excellence so great as to make it, in my estimation, the BOOK OF BOOKS."

For a whole generation Mr. Garrison was denounced by the pro-slavery ministry and church as an infidel. It was so much easier to hurl that epithet at his head than to answer his arguments against slavery! Some professed Abolitionists, in order to propitiate their pro-slavery brethren, joined in circulating this calumny. The New York "Independent," on one occasion, stigmatized him as "an infidel of the most degraded sort;" and the reluctant apology it afterwards made for the outrage did not by any means indicate the presence of that "godly sorrow" that "worketh repentance to salvation." If the men who are so fond of applying the epithet infidel to those who dare to do their own thinking are not careful, they will shortly succeed in changing the word from a term of obloquy to one of honor. Indeed, it has almost come to this already. Wendell Phillips once said, in Faneuil Hall, that he only wished two words written on his tombstone — "Infidel and Traitor: Infidel to a Church that could be at peace in the presence of sin; Traitor to a Government that was a magnificent conspiracy against justice." But in truth, nothing could be more unjust and preposterous than the application of the term infidel to a man like Garrison. There are men in the church, and even in the pulpit, who see and acknowledge this. Several years since, a clergyman, bearing a name of great eminence throughout the Christian world, said to me, in substance: "I should not dare to call Mr. Garrison an infidel, for fear of bringing Christianity itself into reproach. For, if a man can live such a life as he has lived and do what he has done — if he can stand up for God's law of purity and justice in the face of a frowning world, and when even the professed ministers of Christ are recreant — if he can devote himself to the redemption of an outraged and plundered race and be pelted with the vilest epithets for a whole generation, without flinching or faltering, and yet be an infidel, men may well ask what is the value of Christianity? No, no; I must believe that Mr. Garrison is a Christian, who has his walk with God; or he never could have had strength and courage to go through the fiery trials to which he has been exposed." It is due to Mr. Garrison to let him speak for himself upon this point. On one occasion, replying (in 1841) to a most virulent attack made upon him, in a letter to England, by an American clergyman, one of the seceders from the American Anti-Slavery Society, he said: —

"I am as strongly opposed to infidelity as I am to priestcraft and slavery. My religious sentiments (excepting as they relate to certain outward forms and observances, and respecting these I entertain the views of Friends), are as rigid and uncompromising as those promulgated by Christ himself. The standard which he has erected is one that I reverence and advocate. In a true estimate of the Divine authority of the Scriptures no one can go beyond me. They are my text-book, and worth all the other books in the universe. My trust is in God, my aim to walk in the footsteps of his Son, my rejoicing to be crucified to the world, and the world to me. . . . I stand upon the Bible, and the Bible alone, in regard to my views of the Sabbath, the church, and the ministry. If I cannot stand triumphantly on that foundation, I can stand nowhere in the universe."

Ten years later, replying to a similar attack, from another quarter, he said : —

“I claim to be a Christian ; why do you persist in representing me as an infidel? I am a lover of Christian institutions ; why do you accuse me of seeking their overthrow? I have engaged in no reform, I have promulgated no doctrines, which I have not vindicated by an appeal to the Bible — an appeal more frequent than to all other books in the world beside ; why do you insist that my religious views are not in harmony with Divine revelation?”

He adds : —

“Technically I think very little of the Christian name or profession at the present day ; it has long since ceased to be odious — it has become reputable and popular. Eighteen hundred years ago it was a badge of infamy, and decisive evidence of heresy, and cost those who assumed it reputation, ease, wealth, personal safety and life itself. Then it was a test of character ; now it is a fashionable appendage.”

The same charge of infidelity was brought against the anti-slavery movement as led by Mr. Garrison, though no one ever heard an infidel sentiment uttered on its platform. True, the ministry and church were arraigned and condemned ; but they were always criticised by a Christian standard, and condemned because they were false to Christ. The Abolitionists made a broad discrimination between the Church of Christ and the pro-slavery churches of the United States. They revered the former, they denounced and repudiated the latter. They discriminated also between Christianity and churchianity, between piety and “piosity,” between sincerity and cant. When they saw on the one hand the slave clanking his chains, and on the other the great body of the church and clergy indifferent to his wrongs, full of sympathy for the master, and pleading for slavery in the name of Christ and the Bible, they did not mince their words, but said with heart and lip, "Out upon such pretenders! their professions of Christianity are a mockery — their use of the name of Christ to sanction 'robbery and crime and blood,' a hideous blasphemy!" And of this they will repent when it can be shown that it is a sin to call things by their right names.

As to the infidelity of the anti-slavery movement, let Mr. Garrison himself speak:—

"If abolitionism be an infidel movement, it is so only in the same sense in which Jesus was a blasphemer, and the apostles were 'pestilent and seditious fellows, seeking to turn the world upside down.' It is infidel to Satan, the enslaver; it is loyal to Christ, the redeemer. It is infidel to a gospel which makes man the property of man; it is bound up with the Gospel which requires us to love our neighbor as ourselves, and to call no man master. It is infidel to a Church which receives to its communion the 'traffickers in slaves and souls of men'; it is loyal to the Church which is not stained with blood, nor polluted by oppression. It is infidel to the Bible, interpreted as a pro-slavery volume; it is faithful to it as construed on the side of justice and humanity. It is infidel to a Sabbath, on which it is hypocritically pronounced unlawful to extricate the millions who lie bound and bleeding in the pit of slavery; it is true to the Sabbath on which it is well-pleasing to God to bind up the broken-hearted and to let the oppressed go free. It is infidel to all blood-stained compromises, sinful concessions, unholy compacts, respecting the system of slavery; it is devotedly attached to whatever is honest, straight-forward, invincible for the right. No reformatory struggle has ever erected a higher moral standard, or more disinterestedly pursued its object, or more unfalteringly walked by faith, or more confidently trusted in the living God for succor in every extremity, and for a glorious victory at last. At the jubilee its vindication shall be triumphant and universal."

If Jesus may be presumed to have understood and taught his own religion, and if he was right when he declared that all the law and the prophets were summed up in the two commandments which require us to love God with all our hearts, and our neighbor as ourselves, then Mr. Garrison was as Orthodox a Christian, both in theory and practice, as ever lived in this world. Moreover, if to accept Christ as a leader and guide, to imbibe his spirit and follow in his steps, at whatever cost or hazard, is to entitle one's self to the name of Christian, then there are few men to whom that name may be more appropriately applied than to him. His writings, open them where we may, throb with Christian vitality. His doctrine of non-resistance, which has been so much caricatured and ridiculed, and on account of which some narrow-minded bigots thought him unworthy to be a member of the anti-slavery societies which he himself had created, was always presented by him as a Christian doctrine. Here is an extract from the Declaration of Sentiments, written by him, and adopted by the Peace Convention of 1838. See how it breathes the very spirit of Christ:—

“The Prince of Peace, under whose stainless banner we rally, came not to destroy, but to save, even the worst of enemies. He has left us an example, that we should follow his steps. ‘God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.’ . . . We advocate no jacobinical doctrines. The spirit of jacobinism is the spirit of retaliation, violence and murder. It neither fears God, nor regards man. We would be filled with the spirit of Christ. If we abide by our principles, it is impossible for us to be disorderly, or plot treason, or participate in any evil work; we shall submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; obey all the requirements of government, except such as we deem contrary to the commands of the gospel; and in no wise resist the operation of law, except by meekly submitting to the penalty of disobedience. . . . In entering upon the great work before us, we are not unmindful that, in its prosecution, we may be called to test our sincerity even as in a fiery ordeal. . . . We shall not think it strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try us, as though some strange thing had happened unto us; but rejoice, inasmuch as we are partakers of Christ's sufferings. Wherefore, we commit the keeping of our souls to God, as unto a faithful Creator. 'For every one that forsakes houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife or children, or lands, for Christ's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life.'

We may well be patient with those who think Mr. Garrison misunderstood the teachings of Jesus in regard to the law of retaliation and self-defence; but how can we feel anything but disgust and indignation toward those who coolly assert that this passage and others like it embody the spirit of jacobinism and infidelity?

I do not hesitate to express my belief that the anti-slavery movement, while it continued, did more than anything else to elevate the tone and purify the character of American Christianity. It was not without its good influences upon the sects that hated it most. It set before them a standard of morals higher than their own, and sometimes brought blushes to the cheeks of men who affected to despise it. It emancipated thousands from the bondage of sectarianism, and taught them that Christianity does not consist in conformity to a creed, or in the observance of forms, but in purity of life and devotion to the welfare of mankind. It broke the shackles of superstition from a vast multitude of people; and if a few, in the revulsion from detected shams, were swept away from the solid ground of truth, a much greater number were quickened to a new and higher spiritual life. The anti-slavery meetings were distinguished for their earnest and healthful religious tone, and the anti-slavery papers, appealing as they did at all times to what was best and noblest in their readers, exerted a wholesome influence. I believe that the young men and women, who grew up in households where one or more of these papers was a part of the family reading, and where the questions they presented were topics of daily discourse, will, as a rule, be found to be exceptionally high-toned in their views and habits. "It is a dictate of reason," as Mr. Garrison says, "that whatever enlarges the spirit of human sympathy, opposes tyranny in every form, inculcates love and good-will to mankind, and seeks to reconcile a hostile world, must be in consonance with the Divine Mind." I believe there does not live a single reader of "The Liberator," who will not gratefully bear testimony to the truth of every word contained in the following paragraph from the now sainted editor's pen:—

"In the long, dark struggle with national injustice through which I have been called to pass, I have been cheered and strengthened by the knowledge of the reformatory change which has taken place in the sentiments of thousands through the instrumentality of 'The Liberator.' To this they gratefully testify: that it has given them more exalted views of God, a more just appreciation of man, a truer conception of Christianity; that it has emancipated them from the bondage of party and sect, dispelled from their minds the mists of superstition, and made them courageous in the investigation of truth; that it has enlarged the limits of their country, and multiplied the number of their countrymen, so that they no longer regard geographical boundaries, but truly esteem every one as 'a man and a brother,' whether he be near or remote; that, instead of lowering the standard of moral obligation, or lessening the sphere of human duty, it has quickened their moral sense, and given unlimited scope to their sympathies, and supplied them with more objects of benevolent concern than they can readily discharge. This testimony has been borne by its patrons on both sides of the Atlantic. Among those patrons are some of the best intellects, the purest spirits, the most devoted Christians, to be found in Europe or America."

Clarkson, at the close of his "History of the Slave Trade," has this striking passage respecting the great conflict in which he was so long engaged, which is equally true of the anti-slavery movement in America: —

"It [the conflict] has been useful, also, in the discrimination of moral character. In private life, it has enabled us to distinguish the virtuous from the more vicious part of the community. I have had occasion to know many thousand persons in the course of my travels on this subject, and I can truly say that the part which these took on this great question was always a true criterion of their moral character. It has shown the general philanthropist. It has unmasked the vicious in spite of his pretension to virtue. It has separated the moral statesman from the wicked politician. It has shown us who, in the legislative and executive offices of our country, are fit to save, and who to destroy a nation."

A most striking confirmation of these words of Clarkson, in their application to the anti-slavery movement in America, will be found in this extract from "The Savannah Georgian," uttered in 1853: —

"Were the votaries of abolition base and unprincipled, low and degraded, we should have little to fear from their hostility. But this is not the fact. The strongholds of abolition are not the cities, with the vice which generally characterizes the cities; they are the rural districts, with their sober, serious, moral and religious population. Northern abolition mobs are usually composed of the rabble of the towns and cities. Find a community in the free States remarkable for quiet decorum, industrious habits, and religious devotion, and the probability is that there will be found, not perhaps anti-slavery clamor, but anti-slavery feeling in its worst and deepest intensity. These are the men who hate slavery because they believe it sinful."

Was it not cruel in this Southern paper thus to remind the pro-slavery divines of the North, who had done so much to bolster up the system of slavery, that they had their allies, not in the intelligent, God-fearing classes in the rural districts, but in "the rabble of the towns and cities," the "base, unprincipled, low and degraded," who haunted the dens of vice and crime? But, if men will serve the devil, they should be content with their wages!

Mr. Garrison revealed the nobility of his character and his entire confidence in the principles he held, in the fairness with which he treated opponents and critics in his own columns. He always gave them a full hearing, often permitting them to use twice the space that he claimed for himself. In turning over the files of "The Liberator," one is reminded continually of this fact. He believed in free discussion with all his heart, and never shrank from the scalpel of the critic. He often allowed himself to be roundly abused in his paper without offering a word of reply. That he sometimes, in the heat of the struggle, misjudged the motives of men, and so did them injustice, is probably true. That, owing to the strength of his moral convictions, and his intolerance of anything that looked like a dereliction of principle, his tone was sometimes imperious and irritating to men who were sensitive under criticism from a man so eminent, will be admitted by his best friends. He did not always make due allowance for the moral obtuseness that falls short of guilt, and that confusion of the intellect which is compatible with sincerity. But there was not in his heart the least shadow of ill-will, or of a desire to wound. He struck hard blows, and expected to take them in return. No heart was ever more generous than his, more ready to forgive an injury, or quicker to pardon a momentary weakness. The cause of the slave was to him as the apple of his eye; any appearance of treachery to that, however disguised, was sure to kindle his indignation. As to his treatment of opponents, he shall speak for himself:—

“Before ‘The Liberator’ was established, I doubt whether, on either side of the Atlantic, there existed a newspaper or periodical that admitted its opponents to be freely and impartially heard through its columns — as freely as its friends. Without boasting, I claim to have set an example of fairness and magnanimity, in this respect, such as had never been set before; cheerfully conceding to those who were hostile to my views on any subject discussed in ‘The Liberator,’ not only as much space as I, or as others agreeing with me, might occupy, but even more, if they desired it. From this course I have never deviated. Nay, more; I have not waited for opponents to send in their original contributions, but, in the absence of these, have constantly transferred their articles, published in other periodicals, to my own paper, without prompting from any quarter.”

His faith in free discussion is illustrated in passages such as this:—

“Let, then, the mind, and tongue, and press, be free. Let free discussion not only be tolerated, but encouraged and asserted, as indispensable to the freedom and welfare of mankind. . . . If I give my children no other precept — if I leave them no other example — it shall be a fearless, impartial, thorough investigation of every subject to which their attention may be called, and a hearty adoption of the principles which to them may seem true, whether those principles agree or conflict with my own, or with those of any other person. The best protection which I can give them is to secure the unrestricted exercise of their reason, and to inspire them with true self-reliance. I will not arbitrarily determine for them what are orthodox or what heretical sentiments. I have no wish, no right, no authority to do so. I desire them to see, hear and weigh, both sides of every question. For example:—I wish them to examine whatever may be advanced in opposition to the doctrine of the divine inspiration of the Bible, as freely as they do whatever they find in support of it ; to hear what may be urged against the doctrines, precepts, miracles, or life of Jesus, as readily as they do anything in their defence ; to see what arguments are adduced for a belief in the non-existence of God, as unreservedly as they do the evidence in favor of his existence. I shall teach them to regard no subject as too holy for examination ; to make their own convictions paramount to all human authority ; to reject whatever conflicts with their reason, no matter by whomsoever enforced ; and to prefer that which is clearly demonstrative to mere theory."

It is almost needless to say that he was hospitable to new thoughts and facts, from whatever quarter they might come, and if they commended themselves to him, upon examination, as true, he never lacked the courage to avow his faith, regardless of the ridicule or the reproaches of men. An illustration of this is found in his treatment of the subject of modern Spiritualism. Having given much time to an investigation of the phenomena pertaining to the question, and being thoroughly satisfied that he had received many communications from friends in the spirit-world, he did not hesitate to incur the odium involved in a frank avowal and defence of his opinion. To no question that concerned the progress of the human race in knowledge, virtue and freedom, was he indifferent. He was patient even with the great procession of bores who were forever invoking his attention to their crude and ill-digested schemes, and who consumed much time that he would gladly have reserved for some more useful purpose. Called a fool and a fanatic himself, every day of his life, he had great tenderness for weak, well-meaning people, who were victims of the world's indifference or scorn.

XXIII.

Subjects Omitted — The Absorbing Issue in Politics — The Moral Agitation More Intense than Ever — The Fugitive Slave Law — Webster's Apostasy — Trial of Castner Hanway — Anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society Invaded by a Mob — Driven from New York for Two Years — A Flying Leap — Lincoln's Administration — His Re-election — Mr. Garrison's Attitude — Visit to Charleston — Scenes and Incidents — Withdrawal from the American Anti-Slavery Society — Close of "The Liberator."

As I approach the end of my work, I am dismayed in glancing at the list of topics, pertaining to the later period of the anti-slavery movement, on which I have not space to say even a word. The expulsion of Mr. Hoar from Charleston; the war with Mexico in the interest of slavery extension; the annexation of California; the defeat of the attempt to establish slavery on the Pacific coast; the compromises of 1850, including the infamous Fugitive Slave law, and the apostasy of Webster; the slave-catching era, its excitements and convulsions, in Boston, Syracuse, Christiana, and elsewhere; the trial of Castner Hanway for treason; the publication of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," by Harriet Beecher Stowe, and its wonderful effects in creating sympathy for the slaves; the appearance of Richard Hildreth's "White Slave," a most powerful delineation of the workings of slavery; the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and the desperate attempt to force slavery into Kansas; the Dred Scott decision; the John Brown raid, its incidents and consequences; the first election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency; the attempt to avert secession and war by fresh compromises; the attack upon Fort Sumter, and the grand uprising of the North; the futile attempts to put down the Rebellion without destroying slavery; the war, with its ups and down; the Decree of Emancipation; the enlistment of negro soldiers; the re-election of Lincoln in 1864; the final surrender at Appomattox; the assassination of Lincoln; the process of reconstruction; the "Underground Railroad," in all its wide ramifications, affording means of escape to thousands of slaves, whose adventures were of the most thrilling character; the trials and sufferings of men who aided the fugitives in their flight,—these are some of the subjects from which it is hard to turn away, but for the adequate treatment of which another volume is required.

While it is true that the slavery question, during the period referred to above, was the all-absorbing issue in politics, so that every successive election hinged upon it, and the question was thereby forced into every household in the land, it would be a great mistake to suppose that the MORAL AGITATION was either superseded or thrown into the shade. On the contrary, the anti-slavery societies, if we except a portion of the time during the war, were never more active; the anti-slavery papers—"The Liberator," "The Standard," etc.—were never more extensively circulated, or more weighty in their utterances; the anti-slavery speakers were never heard by larger or more deeply interested crowds. Mr. Garrison was in constant request at widely distant points; the words of Phillips echoed throughout the land, criticising, rebuking, inspiring; and Theodore Parker, until death tore him from our side, not only thundered weekly in Music Hall, but from the lecture-platform in many States; and our faithful agents were never more indefatigable in the prosecution of their work. Anniversaries and conventions were points of intense interest; being watched by the politicians as the mariner watches for the beacon on a stormy night. Massachusetts was thoroughly excited and roused. The most thoughtful and serious of the Republicans, who felt how critical was the condition of the country, and who trembled lest their party should shirk the issue, or fail to understand its import, looked to the moral agitators, whom the politicians could not silence, to point out the way of safety and success. If Northern Senators and Representatives in Congress withstood the slaveholders face to face in hot debate, and resisted them by every constitutional means; and if soldiers on the battle-field gave up their lives that the slave might go free; it is none the less true that neither in legislative halls nor on the field of bloody strife could the contest have been carried to a successful issue without the moral influences out of which it originally grew, and from which its inspiration was constantly derived. That these influences came more or less directly from the agitation of which Garrison was the recognized leader, there can be no doubt.

It is not too much to say that there were moments in the struggle when, if the moral agitation had ceased, and Garrison and his friends retired from their work, the North would have faltered and turned back, and the Slave Power would have held the country more firmly than ever in its grasp. Those who remember the dark days of 1850, when, by a combination of the Democratic and Whig parties, a last great effort was made to effect "a final settlement" of the slavery question, by giving the South substantially all that she demanded, and to put the anti-slavery agitation down by a tremendous display of public sentiment and governmental authority, will not need to be reminded how dismal, for a time, was the prospect. Fugitive slaves were hunted in cities and towns on every hand, and ruthlessly dragged back into bondage by the power of the National Government. The court-house in Boston was girded with chains, and official kidnappers, by the aid of the military, marched their victim down State Street, over ground hallowed by patriot blood, and in the presence of an indignant but helpless crowd. It was a question for some time whether the apostate Webster would not drag New England down after him into the pit of infamy to which he had himself descended. Boston, surprised and indignant at first in view of his defection, had been won to his side; Andover Theological Seminary, which for twenty years had interpreted the Bible in the interest of the men-stealers, now made haste to commend him, and to scoff at the idea that Conscience had any right to sit in judgment upon "iniquity framed by law" and sanctioned by the Constitution. Then it was that thirty ministers of the Methodist church made a pious pilgrimage to Marshfield, to congratulate Mr. Webster upon his success in making the land of the Pilgrims a hunting-ground for slaves. And then it was, thank God! that Garrison and his brave comrades, unterrified, unseduced, lifted up a voice of power that rang out over the hills and through the vales of New England, summoning the friends of freedom to the rescue, and bidding them be of good cheer, for God was still God, and the Throne of Iniquity could not prosper. To that summons New England responded, and not New England alone, but the Middle States and the prairies of the West, and the Republic was saved!

The Fugitive Slave law, and the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, virtually declaring that the negroes of the country had "no rights which a white man was bound to respect,"—measures which it was supposed by their inventors would utterly crush the anti-slavery movement,—only added fuel to the flame that was so hot before. They supplied Mr. Garrison and his friends with fresh arguments, and kindled in the hearts of thousands a deep hatred of the Union that bore such accursed fruit. The first of these measures begat a spirit of resistance with which the minions of slavery found themselves unable to cope. Daniel Webster, in the hope of striking terror to the hearts of Abolitionists, set up the doctrine that resistance to the slave-catching statute was treason against the United States, and punishable with death; but the effort to enforce this dictum in the trial of Castner Hanway covered the great "ex-pounder" with universal ridicule.

These days brought great trial and suffering to many. The mob spirit was revived in not a few places. In 1850, the anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society, in New York, was invaded by a band of ruffians, with Isaiah Rynders at their head. His efforts, however, to break up the anniversary failed. The scene was in a high degree dramatic and amusing. Mr. Garrison's coolness and tact as chairman completely baffled the disturbers. Frederick Douglass distinguished himself on this occasion, as on many others, by his wit and eloquence. A subsequent meeting of the society for business was, however, broken up by the same crew, the authorities of the city conniving at the outrage. In 1851 and 1852, the society was unable to secure the use of any church or hall in New York, and its meetings were consequently held in Rochester and Syracuse, successively. In 1853 public sentiment had changed so that there was no longer any fear of disturbance, and the society returned to New York. It should be mentioned that, immediately after the Rynders mob of 1850, Mr. Phillips was invited to speak in Plymouth Church, in Brooklyn, the pastor appearing on the platform to vindicate freedom of speech, and the city authorities protecting the meeting.

But I must take a flying leap from this point to the closing days of the struggle. During the first two years of the war, Mr. Garrison, in common with all other friends of freedom, was exceedingly impatient with what seemed to be the uncertain, shilly-shally policy of President Lincoln. If they could have known all that was passing in his mind, and how fixed was his determination to free the slaves the instant that he believed he could do so rightfully, and with the certainty that the Northern people would stand by him, I have no doubt their patience would have been equal to the crisis; but they had seen so many men in high station falter and fail, that they were in constant terror lest he should be tempted to take some fatal step. He seemed to them like a turtle for slowness, and they piled hot coals upon his back to quicken his movements. But, when at last he issued his Proclamation of Emancipation and committed himself fully to the work of exterminating slavery, Mr. Garrison distrusted him no longer, and took the most charitable view of such of his acts as he could not wholly approve. When combinations were formed to prevent his renomination in 1864, Mr. Garrison gave them no countenance, believing that his re-election was absolutely necessary to keep the North united, and to defeat the schemes of those who were in sympathy with the Rebellion. Mr. Lincoln set a high value upon Mr. Garrison's support, not only as a tribute to his own fidelity, but on account of his great influence among the honest enemies of slavery of every class; and, when the arrangements were made to raise again the Flag of the Union on the walls of Fort Sumter, Mr. Garrison was invited, as a guest of the Government, to witness the imposing spectacle, and informed that his son, George Thompson Garrison, then an officer in the Fifty-fifth Massachusetts (colored) Regiment in South Carolina, would be furloughed in order that he might meet him there. At

EMANCIPATION GROUP.

PRESENTED TO THE CITY OF BOSTON,

By HON MOSES KIMBALL.

Dedicated Dec. 6, 1879.

the suggestion of the Hon. Henry Wilson, a similar invitation was extended to the Hon. George Thompson, the English champion of emancipation, who was then in the country. It was a most happy circumstance that these two men, so long and so intimately associated in the cause of the slave, and who had endured together the fiercest persecution from the minions of slavery, were permitted to mingle their exultations in this grand celebration. The company, including the orator of the occasion, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, went from New York to Charleston in the United States steamer "Arago." Mr. Thompson, in a note written on board the steamer as she was leaving the harbor, said: "In former years, the question was often put to me, 'Why don't you go to the South?' To-day I answer, 'I am going; going to celebrate the triumph of Garrisonian abolitionism in Charleston; going in company with Garrison himself.'"

Mr. Garrison's arrival in Charleston created a great stir among the freedmen, who thronged the streets, rending the air with their shouts, or singing their songs of triumph, whenever he made his appearance. The flag-raising at the fort on Friday, April 14, was a scene of deepest interest, which cannot be described here. On the following day, meetings of the freedmen to do honor to Mr. Garrison, Mr. Thompson, and other distinguished friends of emancipation, were held in "Citadel Square," and "Zion's Church." At an early hour the colored people began to assemble in the square. The colored children from the public schools met at the school-houses and marched to the meeting in procession, led by Superintendent Redpath. While waiting for the speakers to arrive, the crowd was addressed by Major Delaney (colored) of Gen. Saxton's staff. The arrival of Mr. Garrison was announced by the surging and cheering of the vast crowd, whose enthusiasm was irrepressible. Cheering did not sufficiently express their joy; they pressed toward the great leader of the anti-slavery cause, and bore him on their shoulders to the speaker's stand. Senator Wilson, being unable to speak in the open air, it was concluded to adjourn the meeting to "Zion's Church." Three thousand freedmen were packed within the walls of that edifice. Mr. Garrison, Mr. Thompson, the Hon. Henry Wilson, the Rev. Joshua Leavitt, D.D., Judge Kelly of Pennsylvania and others, crowded the platform, while a large number of officers of the army and navy, and a number of ladies, occupied the space in front. Then followed a scene which angels and men might contemplate with equal satisfaction. Samuel Dickerson, one of the men whose shackles were broken by Lincoln's proclamation, rose to perform a duty which had been assigned to him by his emancipated brethren. Accompanied by his two daughters, bearing a beautiful wreath of flowers, he advanced to the pulpit, and, addressing Mr. Garrison, spoke as follows:—

SIR—It is with pleasure that is inexpressible that I welcome you here among us, the long, the steadfast friend of the poor, down-trodden slave. Sir, I have read of you. I have read of the mighty labors you have had for the consummation of this glorious object. Here you see stand before you your handiwork. Three children were robbed from me and I stood desolate. Many a night I pressed a sleepless pillow from the time I retired to my couch until the close of the morning. I lost a dear wife, and after her death that little one, who is the counterpart of her mother's countenance, was taken from me. I appealed for her with all the love and reason of a father. The rejection came forth in these words: "Annoy me not, or I will sell them off to another State." I thank God that through your instrumentality, under the folds of that glorious flag which treason tried to triumph, you have restored them to me. And I tell you it is not this heart alone, but there are mothers, there are fathers, there are sisters, and there are brothers, the pulsations of whose hearts are unimaginable. The greeting that they would give you, sir, it is almost impossible for me to express; but simply, sir, we welcome and look upon you as our saviour. We thank you for what you have done for us. Take this wreath from these children, and when you go home, never mind how faded they may be, preserve them, encase them, and keep them as a token of affection from one who has loved and lived.

Mr. GARRISON, in reply, spoke as follows:—

MY DEAR FRIEND—I have no language to express the feelings of my heart in listening to your kind and strengthening words, in receiving these beautiful tokens of your gratitude, and in looking into the faces of this vast multitude, now happily delivered from the galling fetters of slavery. Let me say at the outset: “Not unto us, not unto us, but unto God be all the glory” for what has been done in regard to your emancipation. I have been actively engaged in this work for almost forty years—for I began when I was quite young to plead the cause of the enslaved in this country. But I never expected to look you in the face, never supposed you would hear of anything I might do in your behalf. I knew only one thing—all that I wanted to know—that you were a grievously oppressed people, and that, on every consideration of justice, humanity and right, you were entitled to immediate and unconditional freedom.

I hate slavery as I hate nothing else in this world. It is not only a crime, but the sum of all criminality; not only a sin, but the sin of sins against Almighty God. I cannot be at peace with it at any time, to any extent, under any circumstances. That I have been permitted to witness its overthrow calls for expressions of devout thanksgiving to Heaven. It was not on account of your complexion or race, as a people, that I espoused your cause, but because you were the children of a common Father, created in the same divine image, having the same inalienable rights, and as much entitled to liberty as the proudest slaveholder that ever walked the earth.

For many a year I have been an outlaw at the South for your sakes, and a large price was set upon my head, simply because I endeavored to remember those in bonds as bound with them. Yes — God is my witness! — I have faithfully tried, in the face of the fiercest opposition, and under the most depressing circumstances, to make your cause my cause; my wife and children your wives and children, subjected to the same outrage and degradation; myself on the same auction-block, to be sold to the highest bidder. Thank God, this day you are free! And be resolved that, once free, you will be free forever. No, not one of you ever will, ever can consent again to become a bondman. Liberty or death, but never slavery.

It gives me joy to assure you that the American Government will stand by you to establish your freedom against whatever claims your masters may bring. The time was when it gave you no protection, but was on the side of the oppressor, where there was power. Now all is changed! Once, I could not feel any gladness at the sight of the American flag, because it was stained with your blood, and under it four millions of slaves were daily driven to unrequited labor. Now it floats, purged of its gory stain; it symbolizes freedom for all, without distinction of race or color. The Government has its hold upon the throat of the monster Slavery, and is strangling the life out of it.

In conclusion, I thank you, my friend, for your affecting and grateful address, and for these handsome tokens of our Heavenly Father's wisdom and goodness, and will try to preserve them in accordance with your wishes. Oh, be assured, I never doubted that I had the gratitude and affection of the entire colored population of the United States, even though personally unknown to so many of them; because I knew that upon me heavily rested the wrath and hatred of your cruel oppressors. I was sure, therefore, if I had them against me, I had you with me. I close with saying, that, long as I have labored in your behalf, while God gives me reason and strength I shall demand for you everything I claim for the whitest of the white in this country.

Gen. Saxton having introduced Senator Wilson, Mr. Garrison asked leave, before he spoke, to pay him a tribute for his faithful labors in the cause. I copy his words in part, as a reply to those who have thoughtlessly charged him with a lack of appreciation of the work done outside of the Garrisonian fold. "Mr. Wilson's life," he said, "(as well as Mr. Sumner's), has been constantly imperilled at the National Capital; so that, from session to session, it has been uncertain whether he would be permitted to see his family and constituents again. He has fought a good fight, and deserves to be crowned with laurels." Eloquent addresses followed from Mr. Wilson and Judge Kelly, and then Mr. Garrison rose to introduce George Thompson, of whom he spoke in terms of warm and affectionate appreciation, for his agency in giving freedom to the slaves in the West Indies, and for his self-sacrificing labors in behalf of the bondmen of America. Mr. Thompson made an exceedingly felicitous address, and was loudly cheered. At every mention of the name of Abraham Lincoln the cheering was like the roaring of the sea in a storm. Mr. Redpath told them of Wendell Phillips, when it was voted, with an emphasis almost loud enough to be heard in Boston, that he be invited to come and address them on the Fourth of July. Other speeches followed, outside as well as inside the church, and the occasion was fraught with an interest hardly inferior to the flag-raising at Sumter.

Mr. Garrison, while remaining in Charleston, was the recipient of many other attentions from the freedmen, expressive of their deep gratitude to him for what he had done to break their chains.

The anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society occurred shortly after Mr. Garrison's return from Charleston. He declared in "The Liberator," in advance of the meeting, that, in his judgment, the time for the dissolution of the society had arrived. Slavery being dead, there was no longer any need of anti-slavery societies. There were, however, some members of the society who had not concurred with

“The Liberator” and “The Anti-Slavery Standard” in the support they gave to the re-election of Lincoln, and who felt that those papers had exhibited a partisanship hardly consistent with perfect fidelity to the cause. Wendell Phillips was avowedly of this opinion, and he and those agreeing with him were in favor of continuing the society and “The Standard.” The subject was earnestly debated in the annual meeting, Mr. Garrison persisting in saying, “My vocation as an Abolitionist, thank God! is ended,” and refusing to be any longer an officer or a member of the society. He thought the work remaining to be done for the enfranchisement, protection and elevation of the people of color could be best performed by new associations, formed for that purpose, and composed, not exclusively of Abolitionists, but of all those friendly to the object. Mr. Quincy concurred with Mr. Garrison, and said :

“Slavery being practically abolished, wanting nothing of technical abolition but certain formalities, as sure to be performed as the world is to endure, it seems to me that anti-slavery is, ipso facto, abolished also. It is an anomaly, a solecism, an absurdity, to maintain an anti-slavery society after slavery is killed.”

Other prominent friends of the cause took the same view. My own opinion was expressed in “The Standard,” in these words :—

“Why run the mill after the grist is out? What if the Constitutional Amendment forever prohibiting the re-establishment of slavery is not yet tied up in the official red tape? There is nothing that Abolitionists can do to make its ratification more certain. Society action is no more needful to this end than to ensure the vernal equinox or the next eclipse, to make fire burn, or water run down hill. The Abolitionists, who have borne the heat and burden of the anti-slavery struggle, have now no distinct function. They should not, it seems to me, persist in occupying an isolated position, but rejoice to mingle with others in the great work of giving to the emancipated people of color the rights and immunities of citizens, and aiding them to rise above all the degrading influences of slavery and caste. It would be absurd to ask that the new wine of this day should be put into our old bottles."

Mr. Phillips and others argued that, as the Constitutional Amendment forbidding the re-establishment of slavery was not yet actually ratified, as the spirit of slavery was still rampant, as the negro was not yet assured of the ballot, and as the people of color were still suffering from many disabilities, the society had an important work to do. Many Abolitionists were reluctant to discontinue the holding of meetings from which they had derived so much enjoyment in the past, and were therefore strongly inclined to vote for their continuance. The vote stood 118 for continuance, 48 for dissolution. It is simple justice to say that among those who voted with the majority were a considerable number who had never acted with the society before, and some who had long been alienated from it, but were suddenly smitten with a conviction of its great usefulness. I do not wish to say a single word that can give pain to anybody; above all, I would not be understood to impeach the motives of any individual. I simply desire, while doing no injustice to others, to make clear to my readers the position taken by Mr. Garrison and those who agreed with him. Among those who voted for continuance were some of the most disinterested friends of Mr. Garrison and the cause, of whose conscientiousness I have no more doubt than I have of my own. The division, however much to be lamented, was not by any means surprising. The Abolitionists had accustomed themselves to the freest exercise of their independent judgment, and this difference, of itself, could not be the cause of any unfriendly feelings. While it has always seemed to me that the society would have had a more dignified ending if it had been dissolved then and there, or at a meeting then appointed; yet I cheerfully concede that the majority did perfectly right in acting upon their own judgment; and if the society did any good afterwards, let it have all the credit on that account which it deserves. But I have never been able to see any reason for continuing it after that date that would not have been equally good for continuing it to the present time, and for an indefinite period in the future.

Mr. Garrison chose to prolong the life of "The Liberator" till the end of December, 1865, so that its files might cover the full period of thirty-five years. The last number contained his original Salutatory, printed on the first of January, 1831, followed by an impressive Valedictory, in which he says:—

"The object for which 'The Liberator' was commenced — the extermination of chattel slavery — having been gloriously consummated, it seems to me specially appropriate to let its existence cover the historical period of the great struggle; leaving what remains to be done to complete the work of emancipation to other instrumentalities (of which I hope to avail myself), under new auspices, with more abundant means, and with millions instead of hundreds for allies. . . . I began 'The Liberator' without a subscriber, and I end it — it gives me unalloyed satisfaction to say — without a farthing as the pecuniary result of the patronage extended to it during thirty-five years of unre-mitted labor. . . . Never had a journal to look such opposition in the face — never was one so constantly belied and caricatured. If it had advocated all the crimes forbidden by the moral law of God and the statutes of the State, instead of vindicating the sacred claims of oppressed and bleeding humanity, it could not have been more vehemently denounced, or more indignantly repudiated."

But for this he had satisfactory compensation in the estimate formed of the paper by those who read it through the dark years of the anti-slavery struggle : —

“To me it has been unspeakably cheering, and the richest compensation for whatever of peril, suffering and defamation I have been called to encounter, that one uniform testimony has been borne, by those who have had its weekly perusal, as to the elevating and quickening influence of ‘The Liberator’ upon their character and aims; and the deep grief they are expressing in view of its discontinuance is overwhelmingly affecting to my feelings.”

Among the congratulatory letters from old friends in the closing number is one from Samuel E. Sewall, from which I quote a few lines, showing the estimate formed of Mr. Garrison by one of the founders of the Liberty party, who was a political Abolitionist ever afterwards. “Without intending,” he says, “to detract in the least from the incalculable value of the exertions and sacrifices of the many other devoted men who have worked for the same object, still it seems to me certain that you have done more than any other person toward effecting the absolute and unconditional abolition of American slavery, the great event of the present age, and perhaps the grandest in the history of the world.” Mr. Sewall was one of Mr. Garrison’s earliest and most devoted friends, and their difference of opinion as to the best method of securing the political action which both desired to witness made no difference whatever in their mutual attachment. Mr. Sewall, indeed, was one of those to whom anti-slavery politics did not mean a withdrawal from moral agitation.

In the last number but one Mr. Garrison gave place to the official ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, forever prohibiting slavery on the soil of the United States. After remarking that he had put this important voucher in type with his own hand, he subjoins this exultant paragraph:—

“Rejoice, and give praise and glory to God, ye who so long and so untiringly participated in all the trials and vicissitudes of the mighty conflict. Having sown in tears, now reap in joy. Hail, redeemed, regenerated America! Hail, North and South, East and West! Hail, the cause of Peace, Liberty, Righteousness, thus mightily strengthened and signally glorified! Hail, the Present, with its transcendent claims, its new duties, its imperative obligations! Hail, the Future, with its pregnant hopes, its glorious promises, its illimitable powers of expansion and development! Hail, ye ransomed millions, no more to be chained, scourged, mutilated, bought and sold in the market, robbed of all rights, hunted as partridges upon the mountain in your flight to obtain deliverance from the house of bondage, branded and scorned as a connecting link between the human race and the brute creation! Hail, all nations, tribes, kindreds and peoples, ‘made of one blood,’ interested in a common redemption, heirs of the same immortal destiny! Hail, angels in glory, and spirits of the just made perfect, and tune your harps anew, singing, ‘Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints! Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou art holy: for all the nations shall come and worship before thee: for thy judgments are manifest.’”

When before, in the history of the world, from Adam until this day, did any great struggle for humanity have a better beginning or a more glorious ending? And when before was it ever given to the founder of so grand a movement to live to witness its complete triumph? “This is the Lord’s doing: it is marvellous in our eyes.”

XXIV.

Mr. Garrison's Last Years — Tokens of Public Respect — His Activity in Reforms — His Power as a Public Speaker — His Modesty — His Hopefulness — His Private and Domestic Life — His Last Illness and Death — The Funeral Services.

I BELIEVE I am warranted in saying that Mr. Garrison's course in counselling the dissolution of the anti-slavery societies, and refusing to be longer identified with them, after slavery was actually dead, though lamented by some of the truest friends of the cause, was regarded with strong approbation by the regenerated public sentiment of the country. "As he knew when and how to begin, so also he knew how and when to stop," was the tribute everywhere instinctively paid to his wisdom and self-abnegation. "He knows when his work is done, and resorts to no weak or unworthy expedients to keep himself in the public eye," was the spontaneous feeling of multitudes. Many of those who had called him "fanatic" all their lives were astonished at this proof of his sound judgment and right feeling. My own belief is, that his course in this particular greatly augmented his influence, and enabled him to do far more for the Southern freedmen than he could have done at the head of an anti-slavery society, "lingering superfluous on the stage." Certainly his name became a power in the land, such as it had never been before. His counsel upon public questions was widely sought, and his judgment held in the highest respect. Having been for half a century true to the negro as a slave, he did not forget him in his efforts for self-improvement, and in his sufferings under other forms of tyranny ; and his voice and pen were still potent in his defence. His word of indignant protest and rebuke was sure to be heard in every instance when the Government failed in its duty to those whose chains it had struck off, and it was never heard in vain.

The public respect and sympathy for him was manifested in the substantial provision made for his support during the remainder of his life. The sum of thirty thousand dollars was raised, mostly in this country, but partly in England, and presented to him on the 10th of March, 1868, in a letter signed by a committee, consisting of Samuel E. Sewall, J. Ingersoll Bowditch, William E. Coffin, William Endicott, Jr., Samuel May, Jr., Edmund Quincy, Thomas Russell, and Robert C. Waterston. John A. Andrew was the chairman of this committee at the time of his death. Among those who also lent their aid in promoting this testimonial, the names of Charles Sumner, Henry Wilson, Rev. Samuel J. May, Salmon P. Chase, Thomas D. Eliot, Ralph Waldo Emerson, John G. Whittier, Henry W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Attorney-General Speed, Alexander H. Rice, George S. Boutwell, Thaddeus Stevens, William D. Kelly, E. B. Washburne, William Cullen Bryant, Horace Greeley, and Gerrit Smith deserve to be mentioned. An examination of these names will show, what I have elsewhere affirmed, that those who fought slavery in the political arena, though dissenting earnestly from some of Mr. Garrison's opinions, yet held him in high esteem as the leader of the moral agitation in which anti-slavery politics had their root. Only the small men of the Republican party, and those least imbued with its distinctive principles, have ever been found denying the truth which its great founders and leaders were ever foremost to acknowledge and affirm.

The last fourteen years of Mr. Garrison's life were filled with such reformatory and philanthropic labors as his impaired health permitted him to perform. He delivered many public addresses, and wrote not a little for the press. Every struggling enterprise of reform was sure of his sympathy and co-operation. Temperance, Peace, Moral Purity, and Woman Suffrage engaged much of his attention, and his pen and voice were always at their service when required. His presence in any public assembly where he was known was sure to elicit visible tokens of popular esteem. One of the latest productions of his pen was a letter on the Chinese question, which showed how clearly he apprehended the universal bearing and application of the principles on which the anti-slavery movement was founded, and how quickly his sympathies flowed out toward all who were oppressed.

He was not, in the usual sense of the word, an orator; nevertheless, he was one of the most impressive and forcible public speakers to whom it has ever been my good fortune to listen. In early life, he was a complete slave to his pen; he could not trust himself to make a speech without carefully writing it out beforehand. He grew tired of this sort of slavery after a while, and resolved to emancipate himself, which he did immediately and triumphantly. He found, upon trial, that thoughts and words on his favorite themes flowed freely. He was so thoroughly alive to his subject, and so intensely in earnest, that he never failed to command the sympathy and attention of his audience. His personal presence disarmed prejudice and inspired confidence, and his constant identification of himself, in thought, principle and feeling, with "those in bonds as bound with them," the clear moral insight that enabled him to comprehend principles and penetrate every disguise of sophistry and false pretence, and his strong appeals to reason and conscience, gave him great power over men, both in public speech and private intercourse. If he lacked the resources which a classical culture alone can furnish, he possessed others of the very highest importance, and which such a culture often fails to supply. If he did not please the imagination or tickle the fancy of his hearers, he did what was better—he enlightened their minds, stirred their consciences, and swayed their judgments. No cause in his hands was ever put to shame by any hasty or ill-considered word. In dealing with opponents, his tact was unfailing. Thoughtful people especially heard him with delight, and the largest audiences felt the power of his logic and the magnetism of his voice and presence.

There was about him no taint of self-seeking, no assumption of the honors of leadership. In all my intercourse with him, extending over a period of more than forty years, I never heard him utter a word implying a consciousness that he was a leader in the cause, or that he had done or achieved anything worthy of praise. He was unfeignedly modest, with not a touch of affected humility. He had the highest appreciation of the services of others, and loved to do them honor, whether they worked by his methods or not. He never mistook a molehill for a mountain, —never fought a battle save upon a vital issue. If he wrote a document for which others as well as himself were to be responsible, he would allow them to criticise, and even to pick it all to pieces, if they chose, content if no principle were dishonored. He thought little of himself, everything of the cause.

He was always courageous and hopeful. Never in a single instance did I see him in a discouraged mood. His faith in the goodness of his cause and in the overruling Providence of God was so absolute that he was calm and cheerful alike under clear or cloudy skies. I have seen him again and again when the expenses of "The Liberator" were running far beyond its receipts, and he did not know whence the money was to come to supply the wants of his family; but never once did any shadow fall upon his spirits on this account. He had given himself and all his powers to a cause that he believed had the favor and support of Heaven; and he did not doubt that in some way he would be taken care of. And help always did come — sometimes in unexpected and surprising ways. His unselfish devotion to his work touched and opened the hearts of all who witnessed it, disposing them to stay up his hands and relieve him of pecuniary embarrassment. If in his greatest extremity he had been absolutely certain that he could make his paper profitable by the slightest dereliction of principle, by trimming a little on this side or that, or by the suppression of unpopular truth, he never would have yielded to the temptation.

Of Mr. Garrison's private, domestic and social life I hardly dare trust myself to speak. A man of more spotless excellence in every relation of life I have never known. As a husband, father and friend he was indeed a model, and his home was ever the abode of love and peace. His wife, the youngest daughter of the late Mr. George Benson, of Brooklyn, Conn., was a noble woman and a true helpmate. Mr. Garrison's devotion, as a husband and father, was one of his most beautiful characteristics. He never made his public relations an excuse for neglecting his family. Did one of the children cry in the night, it was in his arms that it was caressed and comforted. In every possible way, in the care of the children and in all household matters, he sought to lighten the cares of his wife, taking upon himself burdens which most husbands and fathers shun. In short, he made his home a heaven, into which it was a delight to enter. He was never so happy as when surrounded by his wife and children and a few favored guests. Under such circumstances he was at his best — happy as a bird, genial, witty and full of a generous hospitality.

In 1864 Mr. Garrison purchased the estate in Roxbury known as "Rockledge," which was his home for the remainder of his life; and never did the sun look down upon a happier household than that by which he was surrounded. Children and grandchildren rose up to do him honor, and the gracious sweetness of his nature was in perpetual flow. The great work of his life done, and well done, he gave himself up very largely to the social enjoyments which are the best solace of age. There was but one drawback to his happiness now, and that was the illness of his beloved wife. With what tenderness and solicitude he watched over her, making all his plans, so far as possible, tributary to her welfare, only his most intimate friends can ever know. And her unselfish thoughtfulness was equal to his own. Invalid that she was, she cast no shadow upon the household enjoyment, but made it brighter by her smiles and cheerful words. Her death in 1876 left a void in the heart of her husband, and in the household as well, that could never be filled. But his faith in another and a better life beyond the grave made him cheerful to the last. By hundreds of his dear friends "Rockledge" will ever be remembered as the scene of hospitalities large, free and confiding; a home in which every virtue that adorns humanity was exemplified.

His reverence for woman was strong, and no one ever heard from his lips a word or a sentiment that could bring a blush to her cheek. He had a tender regard for the feelings of others, and was always thoughtful for their comfort and convenience. Especially was he studious for the comfort of servants and others in his employ, willingly inconveniencing himself for their sake. His kindness extended to the brute creation. The household cat missed him when he was absent and welcomed him on his return. Once, when a boy, he came home after a protracted absence, and being awakened out of sleep by Tabby's purr, found that she had brought to his pillow her whole brood of new-born kittens, confident of his sympathy in her maternal joy. He placed good Mr. Bergh high on the roll of benefactors for his kind intervention in behalf of the oppressed brute creation, and his face lighted up with enthusiasm in telling stories of Rarey's exploits in subduing fractious horses by kindness. To the poor and the unfortunate his heart and his purse were ever open. Children were drawn to him by an irresistible attraction. His conversation, though generally serious, often sparkled with wit and fun. In how many families is his name now spoken with a tender, tearful reverence, while the memory of his gracious presence as a guest will be fondly cherished and proudly transmitted.

LATE RESIDENCE OF WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, ROXBURY, MASS.

Seven children were born to Mr. Garrison, two of whom—a son and daughter—died in infancy. The names of those who survive are as follows, in the order of their birth:—George Thompson, William Lloyd, Wendell Phillips, Fanny (wife of Mr. Henry Villard, at whose house the father died), and Francis Jackson. It is understood that his sons will write the life of their father, for which the materials must be abundant. Massachusetts will some day honor herself by erecting a monument to his memory. But the best of all mementoes of his noble life are the broken fetters of four millions of slaves!

Of Mr. Garrison's last illness and death I can give no more satisfactory account than that contained in the pamphlet report of the funeral exercises:—

“The announcement of his critical illness, speedily followed by that of his death, while absent from home, took his friends and the public on both sides of the Atlantic by surprise ; for though it was known that he had been infirm in health, the vigor of his recent contributions to the public press (the latest of which, in denunciation of the anti-Chinese bill, and on the exodus of the freedmen of Mississippi and Louisiana to Kansas, had appeared within a few weeks) had made it difficult to believe that his health was at all precarious. Only his family and immediate friends knew that those letters were written while he was suffering such pain and discomfort that the feeling that he must lift up his voice, and bear his testimony once more on the question of human rights, alone enabled him to accomplish the task. The exhaustion and prostration which followed these efforts made it evident to himself that his forces were nearly spent, and gave his family much concern.

“ Even from his seventy-third birthday (December 10, 1878), his private letters were marked by forebodings of his approaching end, which he welcomed as a relief from physical infirmities. In the following April, 1879, the feeling which he described as a giving way of the internal organism became so strong, and his malady (a chronic affection of the kidneys) so intolerable, that, at the solicitation of his daughter, he went to New York to put himself under the care of her family physician. He arrived at the Westmoreland Apartment House, where she resided, on Monday afternoon, April 28th. On Wednesday the treatment began, with immediate promise of good results ; which was, however, of necessity, soon disappointed. On Saturday, May 10th, he took to his bed, but even then those about him did not fairly realize the gravity of his condition. At the end of another week, however, the symptoms became unmistakably alarming, and on Tuesday, May 20th, the members of the family in Boston were summoned by telegraph. They arrived the next day. The final changes proceeded slowly, and the death-struggle did not set in till half-past ten o'clock on the evening of Friday. Up to that time, though disinclined to talk unless spoken to, he retained all his faculties, and recognized his children and grandchildren by voice and by sight ; and only an hour or two before he lost this consciousness, he listened with manifest pleasure to the singing of his favorite hymns, to which, as he lay outstretched, he beat time both with his hands and feet. He expired peacefully at a few minutes past 11 o'clock on the succeeding night, Saturday, May 24th. His illness had been in many respects a distressing one, even in comparison with the wretched months that preceded it; but the prevailing sense was of weariness—frequently expressed in a desire to 'go home'—rather than of acute bodily pain, though that was not wanting. His vitality was remarkably illustrated throughout.

“A post-mortem examination having been made on Monday, Mr. Garrison's remains were removed the same night to Roxbury, Mass. On Wednesday afternoon, May 28th, the funeral services were held in the neighboring church of the First Religious Society, which the trustees had kindly placed at the disposal of the family and the public.”

Mr. Garrison was exceedingly fond of sacred music. He had a fine ear and an excellent voice, and loved to sing the church tunes and anthems which he learned in boyhood, whenever he could find others to sing with him. As he moved about the house or played with the children, from day to day, his voice often broke forth in his favorite hymns or songs. The following are some of the pieces which his children sang to him in his dying hours, and which evidently gave him great pleasure :—

Hebron.—Thus far the Lord hath led me on,
Thus far His power prolongs my days,
And every evening shall make known
Some fresh memorial of His grace.

Christmas.—Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve,
And press with vigor on;
A heavenly race demands thy zeal,
And an immortal crown.

Amsterdam.—Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings,
Thy better portion trace;
Rise from transitory things
To Heaven, thy native place.

Confidence.—Now can my soul in God rejoice.

Coronation.—All hail the power of Jesus' name.

Old Hundred.—From all that dwell below the skies.

Portuguese Hymn.—The Lord is my Shepherd.

Lenox.—Ye tribes of Adam join
With Heaven and earth and seas,
And offer notes divine
To your Creator's praise.

Mr. Garrison's funeral was remarkable for the number of his surviving friends and co-laborers in the anti-slavery and kindred reformatory movements who came to pay the last tribute of respect to his character and memory. There were also present not a few who were formerly either indifferent or hostile to the anti-slavery cause, but who now desired to show their respect and admiration for him on account of the great work to which his life had been consecrated. Many colored people also were present. In accordance with Mr. Garrison's views of death, care was taken to avoid the appearance of mourning and gloom which generally characterizes such occasions. The blinds were opened to admit the sweet sunlight, the pulpit was decorated with flowers, and the hymns of cheer and inspiration of which he was so fond were sung. The whole audience rose when the body was borne into the church, followed by the pall-bearers and the family. The pall-bearers were Wendell Phillips, Samuel May, Samuel E. Sewall, Robert F. Wallcut, Theodore D. Weld, Oliver Johnson, Lewis Hayden and Charles Mitchell — the two last named being colored men.

The exercises were conducted by the Rev. Samuel May, one of Mr. Garrison's most trusted friends, who for nearly twenty years was the general agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society. After repeating the Lord's Prayer, he read a selection from the portions of Scripture which Mr. Garrison used frequently to read in anti-slavery meetings. Then followed addresses of a most appropriate character from Mr. May, Mrs. Lucy Stone, Rev. Samuel Johnson, Theodore D. Weld and Wendell Phillips, interspersed with music by a quartette of colored singers, composed of Mrs. Nellie B. Mitchell, soprano; Miss Fannie A. Washington, contralto; Mr. William Walker, tenor; Mr. Lewis A. Fisher, basso. The pieces sung were: "Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve;" "Ye tribes of Adam, join;" and "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings." Mr. Johnson, at the close of his address, read portions of the poem by John G. Whittier, which will be found in the appendix, together with the address of Mr. Phillips.

The whole assembly availed themselves of the opportunity to look reverently at the face of the dead, and during the time occupied by this ceremony a great number of Mr. Garrison's old friends embraced the opportunity to exchange friendly greetings, and to speak tenderly and affectionately, but not sadly, of their departed leader.

As the last rays of the setting sun fell in serene beauty upon the cemetery at Forest Hills, glorifying that "city of the dead," the remains of the great philanthropist were laid, with tender and reverent hands, in the grave, by the side of his departed wife, in the presence of his children and grandchildren and many of his old associates in the anti-slavery struggle. Before the grave was filled, the quartette of colored singers, that had rendered such acceptable service at the church, sang a hymn, commencing, "I cannot always trace the way," after which the company retired, leaving all that was mortal of WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON to its rest.

THE END.

APPENDIX.

REMARKS OF WENDELL PHILLIPS

AT THE

FUNERAL OF WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON,

Boston, May 28, 1879.

It has been well said that we are not here to weep, and neither are we here to praise. No life closes without sadness. Death, after all, no matter what hope or what memories surround it, is terrible and a mystery. We never part hands that have been clasped life-long in loving tenderness but the hour is sad; still, we do not come here to weep. In other moments, elsewhere, we can offer tender and loving sympathy to those whose roof-tree is so sadly bereaved. But in the spirit of the great life which we commemorate, this hour is for the utterance of a lesson; this hour is given to contemplate a grand example, a rich inheritance, a noble life worthily ended. You come together, not to pay tribute, even loving tribute, to the friend you have lost, whose features you will miss from daily life, but to remember the grand lesson of that career; to speak to each other, and to emphasize what that life teaches,—especially in the hearing of these young listeners, who did not see that marvellous career ; in their hearing to construe the meaning of the great name which is borne world-wide, and tell them why on both sides the ocean, the news of his death is a matter of interest to every lover of his race. As my friend said, we have no right to be silent. Those of us who stood near him, who witnessed the secret springs of his action, the consistent inward and outward life, have no right to be silent. The largest contribution that will ever be made by any single man's life to the knowledge of the working of our institutions will be the picture of his career. He sounded the depths of the weakness, he proved the ultimate strength, of republican institutions ; he gave us to know the perils that confront us ; he taught us to rally the strength that lies hid.

To my mind there are three remarkable elements in his career. One is rare even among great men. It was his own moral nature, unaided, uninfluenced from outside, that consecrated him to a great idea. Other men ripen gradually. The youngest of the great American names that will be compared with his was between thirty and forty when his first anti-slavery word was uttered. Luther was thirty-four years old when an infamous enterprise woke him to indignation, and it then took two years more to reveal to him the mission God designed for him. This man was in jail for his opinions when he was just twenty-four. He had confronted a nation in the very bloom of his youth. It could be said of him more than of any other American in our day, and more than of any great leader that I chance now to remember in any epoch, that he did not need circumstances, outside influence, some great pregnant event to press him into service, to provoke him to thought, to kindle him into enthusiasm. His moral nature was as marvellous as was the intellect of Pascal. It seemed to be born fully equipped, "finely touched." Think of the mere dates ; think that at some twenty-four years old, while Christianity and statesmanship, the experience, the genius of the land, were wandering in the desert, aghast, amazed, and confounded over a frightful evil, a great sin, this boy sounded, found, invented the talisman, "Immediate, unconditional emancipation on the soil." You may say he borrowed it — true enough — from the lips of a woman on the other side of the Atlantic; but he was the only American whose moral nature seemed, just on the edge of life, so perfectly open to duty and truth that it answered to the far-off bugle-note, and proclaimed it instantly as a complete solution of the problem.

Young men, you have no conception of the miracle of that insight; for it is not given to you to remember with any vividness the blackness of the darkness of ignorance and indifference which then brooded over what was called the moral and religious element of the American people. When I think of him, as Melancthon said of Luther, "day by day grows the wonder fresh" at the ripeness of the moral and intellectual life that God gave him at the very opening.

You hear that boy's lips announcing the statesmanlike solution which startled politicians and angered church and people. A year afterwards, with equally single-hearted devotion, in words that have been so often quoted, with those dungeon doors behind him, he enters on his career. In January, 1831, then twenty-five years old, he starts the publication of "The Liberator," advocating the immediate abolition of slavery; and, with the sublime pledge, "I will be as harsh as truth and as uncompromising as justice. On this subject I do not wish to speak or write with moderation. I will not equivocate — I will not excuse — I will not retreat a single inch — AND I WILL BE HEARD."

Then began an agitation which for the marvel of its origin, the majesty of its purpose, the earnestness, unselfishness and ability of its appeals, the vigor of its assault, the deep national convulsion it caused, the vast and beneficent changes it wrought, and its wide-spread, indirect influence on all kindred moral questions, is without a parallel in history since Luther. This boy created and marshalled it. His converts held it up and carried it on. Before this, all through the preceding century, there had been among us scattered and single abolitionists, earnest and able men; sometimes, like Wythe of Virginia, in high places. The Quakers and Covenanters had never intermitted their testimony against slavery. But Garrison was the first man to begin a movement designed to annihilate slavery. He announced the principle, arranged the method, gathered the forces, enkindled the zeal, started the argument, and finally marshalled the nation for and against the system in a conflict that came near rending the Union.

I marvel again at the instinctive sagacity which discerned the hidden forces fit for such a movement, called them forth, and wielded them to such prompt results. Archimedes said, "Give me a spot and I will move the world." O'Connell leaned back on three millions of Irishmen, all on fire with sympathy. Cobden's hands were held up by the whole manufacturing interest of Great Britain; his treasury was the wealth of the middle classes of the country, and behind him also, in fair proportion, stood the religious convictions of England. Marvellous was their agitation; as you gaze upon it in its successive stages and analyze it, you are astonished at what they invented for tools. But this boy stood alone; utterly alone, at first. There was no sympathy anywhere; his hands were empty; one single penniless comrade was his only helper. Starving on bread and water, he could command the use of types, that was all. Trade endeavored to crush him; the intellectual life of America disowned him.

My friend Weld has said the church was a thick bank of black cloud looming over him. Yes. But no sooner did the church discern the impetuous boy's purpose than out of that dead, sluggish cloud thundered and lightened a malignity which could not find words to express its hate. The very pulpit where I stand saw this apostle of liberty and justice sore beset, always in great need, and often in deadly peril; yet it never gave him one word of approval or sympathy. During all his weary struggle, Mr. Garrison felt its weight in the scale against him. In those years it led the sect which arrogates to itself the name of Liberal. If this was the bearing of so-called Liberals, what bitterness of opposition, judge ye, did not the others show? A mere boy confronts church, commerce, and college; a boy with neither training nor experience! Almost at once the assault tells; the whole country is hotly interested. What created such life under those ribs of death? Whence came that instinctive knowledge? Where did he get that sound common-sense? Whence did he summon that almost unerring sagacity which, starting agitation on an untried field, never committed an error, provoking year by year additional enthusiasm; gathering, as he advanced, helper after helper to his side! I marvel at the miraculous boy. He had no means. Where he got, whence he summoned, how he created, the elements which changed 1830 into 1835—1830 apathy, indifference, ignorance, icebergs, into 1835, every man intelligently hating him, and mobs assaulting him in every city—is a marvel which none but older men than I can adequately analyze and explain. He said to a friend who remonstrated with him on the heat and severity of his language, "Brother, I have need to be all on fire, for I have mountains of ice about me to melt." Well, that dungeon of 1830, that universal apathy, that deadness of soul, that contempt of what called itself intellect, in ten years he changed into the whole country aflame. He made every single home, press, pulpit, and senate-chamber a debating society, with his right and wrong for the subject. And as was said of Luther, "God honored him by making all the worst men his enemies."

Fastened on that daily life was a malignant attention and criticism such as no American has ever endured. I will not call it a criticism of hate; that word is not strong enough. Malignity searched him with candles from the moment he uttered that God-given solution of the problem to the moment when he took the hand of the nation and wrote out the statute which made it law. Malignity searched those forty years with candles, and yet even malignity has never lisped a suspicion, much less a charge—never lisped a suspicion of anything mean, dishonorable, dishonest. No man, however mad with hate, however fierce in assault, ever dared to hint that there was anything low in motive, false in assertion, selfish in purpose, dishonest in method—never a stain on the thought, the word, or the deed.

Now contemplate this boy entering such an arena, confronting a nation and all its forces, utterly poor, with no sympathy from any quarter, conducting an angry, widespread, and profound agitation for ten, twenty, forty years, amid the hate of everything strong in American life, and the contempt of everything influential, and no stain, not the slightest shadow of one, rests on his escutcheon! Summon me the public men, the men who have put their hands to the helm of the vessel of state since 1789, of whom that can be said, although love and admiration, which almost culminated in worship, attended the steps of some of them.

Then look at the work he did. My friends have spoken of his influence. What American ever held his hand so long and so powerfully on the helm of social, intellectual, and moral America? There have been giants in our day. Great men God has granted in widely different spheres; earnest men, men whom public admiration lifted early into power. I shall venture to name some of them. Perhaps you will say it is not usual on an occasion like this, but long-waiting truth needs to be uttered in an hour when this great example is still absolutely indispensable to inspire the effort, to guide the steps, to cheer the hope, of the nation not yet arrived in the promised land. I want to show you the vast breadth and depth that this man's name signifies. We have had Webster in the Senate; we have had Lyman Beecher in the pulpit; we have had Calhoun at the head of a section; we have had a philosopher at Concord with his inspiration penetrating the young mind of the Northern States. They are the four men that history, perhaps, will mention somewhere near the great force whose closing in this scene we commemorate to-day. Remember now not merely the inadequate means at this man's control, not simply the bitter hate that he confronted, not the vast work that he must be allowed to have done,—surely vast, when measured by the opposition he encountered and the strength he held in his hands,—but dismissing all those considerations, measuring nothing but the breadth and depth of his hold, his grasp on American character, social change, and general progress, what man's signet has been set so deep, planted so forever on the thoughts of his epoch? Trace home intelligently, trace home to their sources, the changes social, political, intellectual and religious, that have come over us during the last fifty years,—the volcanic convulsions, the stormy waves which have tossed and rocked our generation,—and you will find close at the sources of the Mississippi this boy with his proclamation!

The great party that put on record the statute of freedom was made up of men whose conscience he quickened and whose intellect he inspired, and they long stood the tools of a public opinion that he created. The grandest name beside his in the America of our times is that of John Brown. Brown stood on the platform that Garrison built; and Mrs. Stowe herself charmed an audience that he gathered for her, with words which he inspired, from a heart that he kindled. Sitting at his feet were leaders born of "The Liberator," the guides of public sentiment. I know whereof I affirm. It was often a pleasant boast of Charles Sumner that he read "The Liberator" two years before I did, and among the great men who followed his lead and held up his hands in Massachusetts, where is the intellect, where is the heart that does not trace to this printer-boy the first pulse that bade him serve the slave? For myself, no words can adequately tell the measureless debt I owe him, the moral and intellectual life he opened to me. I feel like the old Greek, who, taught himself by Socrates, called his own scholars "the disciples of Socrates."

This is only another instance added to the roll of the Washingtons and the Hampdens, whose root is not ability, but character; that influence which, like the great Master's of Judea (humanly speaking), spreading through the centuries, testifies that the world suffers its grandest changes not by genius, but by the more potent control of character. His was an earnestness that would take no denial, that consumed opposition in the intensity of its convictions, that knew nothing but right. As friend after friend gathered slowly, one by one, to his side, in that very meeting of a dozen heroic men, to form the New England Anti-Slavery Society, it was his compelling hand, his resolute unwillingness to temper or qualify the utterance, that finally dedicated that first organized movement to the doctrine of immediate emancipation. He seems to have understood — this boy without experience — he seems to have understood by instinct that righteousness is the only thing which will finally compel submission; that one, with God, is always a majority. He seems to have known it at the very outset, taught of God, the herald and champion, God-endowed and God-sent to arouse a nation, that only by the most absolute assertion of the uttermost truth, without qualification or compromise, can a nation be waked to conscience or strengthened for duty. No man ever understood so thoroughly — not O'Connell, nor Cobden — the nature and needs of that agitation which alone, in our day, reforms states. In the darkest hour he never doubted the omnipotence of conscience and the moral sentiment.

And then look at the unquailing courage with which he faced the successive obstacles that confronted him! Modest, believing at the outset that America could not be as corrupt as she seemed, he waits at the door of the churches, importunes leading clergymen, begs for a voice from the sanctuary, a consecrated protest from the pulpit. To his utter amazement, he learns, by thus probing it, that the church will give him no help, but, on the contrary, surges into the movement in opposition. Serene, though astounded by the unexpected revelation, he simply turns his footsteps, and announces that "a Christianity which keeps peace with the oppressor is no Christianity," and goes on his way to supplant the religious element which the church had allied with sin by a deeper religious faith. Yes, he sets himself to work, this stripling with his sling confronting the angry giant in complete steel, this solitary evangelist, to make Christians of twenty millions of people! I am not exaggerating. You know, older men, who can go back to that period; I know that when one, kindred to a voice that you have heard to-day, whose pathway Garrison's bloody feet had made easier for the treading, when he uttered in a pulpit in Boston only a few strong words, injected in the course of a sermon, his venerable father, between seventy and eighty years, was met the next morning and his hand shaken by a much moved friend. "Colonel, you have my sympathy. I cannot tell you how much I pity you." "What," said the brusque old man, "what is your pity?" "Well, I hear your son went crazy at 'Church Green' yesterday." Such was the utter indifference. At that time, bloody feet had smoothed the pathway for other men to tread. Still, then and for years afterwards, insanity was the only kind-hearted excuse that partial friends could find for sympathy with such a madman!

If anything strikes one more prominently than another in this career — to your astonishment, young men, you may say — it is the plain, sober common-sense, the robust English element which underlay Cromwell, which explains Hampden, which gives the color that distinguishes 1640 in England from 1790 in France. Plain, robust, well-balanced common-sense. Nothing erratic; no enthusiasm which had lost its hold on firm earth; no mistake of method; no unmeasured confidence; no miscalculation of the enemy's strength. Whoever mistook, Garrison seldom mistook. Fewer mistakes in that long agitation of fifty years can be charged to his account than to any other American. Erratic as men supposed him, intemperate in utterance, mad in judgment, an enthusiast gone crazy, the moment you sat down at his side, patient in explanation, clear in statement, sound in judgment, studying carefully every step, calculating every assault, measuring the force to meet it, never in haste, always patient, waiting until the time ripened, — fit for a great leader. Cull, if you please, from the statesmen who obeyed him, whom he either whipped into submission or summoned into existence, cull from among them the man whose career, fairly examined, exhibits fewer miscalculations and fewer mistakes than this career which is just ended.

I know what I claim. As Mr. Weld has said, I am speaking to-day to men who judge by their ears, by rumors; who see, not with their eyes, but with their prejudices. History, fifty years hence, dispelling your prejudices, will do justice to the grand sweep of the orbit which, as my friend said, to-day we are hardly in a position, or mood, to measure. As Coleridge avers, "The truth-haters of to-morrow will give the right name to the truth-haters of to-day, for even such men the stream of time bears onward." I do not fear that if my words are remembered by the next generation they will be thought unsupported or extravagant. When history seeks the sources of New England character, when men begin to open up and examine the hidden springs and note the convulsions and the throes of American life within the last half century, they will remember Parker, that Jupiter of the pulpit; they will remember the long unheeded but measureless influence that came to us from the seclusion of Concord; they will do justice to the masterly statesmanship which guided, during a part of his life, the efforts of Webster, but they will recognize that there was only one man north of Mason and Dixon's line who met squarely, with an absolute logic, the else impregnable position of John C. Calhoun; only one brave, far-sighted, keen, logical intellect, which discerned that there were only two moral points in the universe, right and wrong; that when one was asserted, subterfuge and evasion would be sure to end in defeat.

Here lies the brain and the heart; here lies the statesman-like intellect, logical as Jonathan Edwards, brave as Luther, which confronted the logic of South Carolina with an assertion direct and broad enough to make an issue and necessitate a conflict of two civilizations. Calhoun said, Slavery is right. Webster and Clay shrunk from him and evaded his assertion. Garrison, alone at that time, met him face to face, proclaiming slavery a sin and daring all the inferences. It is true, as New Orleans complains to-day in her journals, that this man brought upon America everything they call the disaster of the last twenty years; and it is equally true that if you seek through the hidden causes and unheeded events for the hand that wrote "emancipation" on the statute-book and on the flag, it lies still there to-day.

I have no time to number the many kindred reforms to which he lent as profound an earnestness and almost as large aid.

I hardly dare enter that home. There is one other marked, and, as it seems to me, unprecedented, element in this career. His was the happiest life I ever saw. No need for pity. Let no tear fall over his life. No man gathered into his bosom a fuller sheaf of blessing, delight, and joy. In his seventy years, there were not arrows enough in the whole quiver of the church or state to wound him. As Guizot once said from the tribune, "Gentlemen, you cannot get high enough to reach the level of my contempt." So Garrison, from the serene level of his daily life, from the faith that never faltered, was able to say to American hate, "You cannot reach up to the level of my home mood, my daily existence." I have seen him intimately for thirty years, while raining on his head was the hate of the community, when by every possible form of expression malignity let him know that it wished him all sorts of harm. I never saw him unhappy; I never saw the moment that serene, abounding faith in the rectitude of his motive, the soundness of his method, and the certainty of his success did not lift him above all possibility of being reached by any clamor about him. Every one of his near friends will agree with me that this was the happiest life God has granted in our day to any American standing in the foremost rank of influence and effort.

Adjourned from the stormiest meeting, where hot debate had roused all his powers as near to anger as his nature ever let him come, the music of a dozen voices—even of those who had just opposed him—or a piano, if the house held one, changed his mood in an instant, and made the hour laugh with more than content; unless indeed, a baby and playing with it proved metal even more attractive.

To champion wearisome causes, bear with disordered intellects, to shelter the wrecks of intemperance and fugitives whose pulse trembled at every touch on the door-latch—this was his home; keenly alive to human suffering, ever prompt to help relieve it, pouring out his means for that more lavishly than he ought—all this was no burden, never clouded or depressed the inextinguishable buoyancy and gladness of his nature. God ever held over him unclouded the sunlight of his countenance.

And he never grew old. The tabernacle of flesh grew feebler and the step was less elastic. But the ability to work, the serene faith and unflagging hope suffered no change. To the day of his death he was as ready as in his boyhood to confront and defy a mad majority. The keen insight and clear judgment never failed him. His tenacity of purpose never weakened. He showed nothing either of the intellectual sluggishness or the timidity of age. The bugle-call which, last year, woke the nation to its peril and duty on the Southern question, showed all the old fitness to lead and mould a people's course. Younger men might be confused or dazed by plausible pretensions, and half the North was befooled; but the old pioneer detected the false ring as quickly as in his youth. The words his dying hand traced, welcoming the Southern exodus and foretelling its result, had all the defiant courage and prophetic solemnity of his youngest and boldest days.

Serene, fearless, marvellous man! Mortal, with so few shortcomings!

Farewell, for a very little while, noblest of Christian men! Leader, brave, tireless, unselfish! When the ear heard thee, then it blessed thee; the eye that saw thee gave witness to thee. More truly than it could ever heretofore be said since the great patriarch wrote it, "the blessing of him that was ready to perish" was thine eternal great reward.

Though the clouds rest for a moment to-day on the great work that you set your heart to accomplish, you knew, God in his love let you see, that your work was done; that one thing, by his blessing on your efforts, is fixed beyond the possibility of change. While that ear could listen, God gave what He has so rarely given to man, the plaudits and prayers of four millions of victims, thanking you for emancipation, and through the clouds of to-day your heart, as it ceased to beat, felt certain, certain, that whether one flag or two shall rule this continent in time to come, one thing is settled—it never henceforth can be trodden by a slave!

To W. L. G.

CHAMPION of those who groan beneath
Oppression's iron hand:

In view of penury, hate, and death,
I see thee fearless stand.

Still bearing up thy lofty brow,
In the steadfast strength of truth,
In manhood sealing well the vow
And promise of thy youth.

Go on, — for thou hast chosen well;
On in the strength of God!
Long as one human heart shall swell
Beneath the tyrant's rod.

Speak in a slumbering nation's ear,
 As thou hast ever spoken,
 Until the dead in sin shall hear, —
 The fetter's link be broken !

I love thee with a brother's love;
 I feel my pulses thrill,
 To mark thy spirit soar above
 The cloud of human ill.
 My heart hath leaped to answer thine,
 And echo back thy words,
 As leaps the warrior's at the shine
 And flash of kindred swords !

They tell me thou art rash and vain, —
 A searcher after fame;
 That thou art striving but to gain
 A long-enduring name;
 That thou hast nerved the Afric's hand
 And steeled the Afric's heart,
 To shake aloft his vengeful brand,
 And rend his chain apart.

Have I not known thee well, and read
 Thy mighty purpose long ?
 And watched the trials which have made
 Thy human spirit strong ?
 And shall the slanderer's demon breath
 Avail with one like me,
 To dim the sunshine of my faith
 And earnest trust in thee ?

Go on, — the dagger's point may glare
 Amid thy pathway's gloom, —
 The fate which sternly threatens there
 Is glorious martyrdom !
 Then onward with a martyr's zeal;
 And wait thy sure reward
 When man to man no more shall kneel,
 And God alone be Lord !

GARRISON.

THE storm and peril overpast,
The hounding hatred shamed and still,
Go, soul of freedom! take at last
The place which thou alone canst fill.

Confirm the lesson taught of old—Life saved for self is lost, while they Who lose it in His service hold
The lease of God's eternal day.

Not for thyself, but for the slave
Thy words of thunder shook the world;
No selfish griefs or hatred gave
The strength wherewith thy bolts were hurled.

From lips that Sinai's trumpet blew
We heard a tenderer undersong;
Thy very wrath from pity grew,
From love of man thy hate of wrong.

Now past and present are as one;
The life below is life above;
Thy mortal years have but begun
The immortality of love.

With somewhat of thy lofty faith
We lay thy outworn garment by,
Give death but what belongs to death,
And life the life that cannot die!

Not for a soul like thine the calm
Of selfish ease and joys of sense;
But duty, more than crown or palm,
Its own exceeding recompense.

Go up and on! thy day well done,
Its morning promise well fulfilled,
Arise to triumphs yet unwon,
To holier tasks that God has willed.

Go, leave behind thee all that mars
 The work below of man for man ;
 With the white legions of the stars
 Do service such as angels can.

Wherever wrong shall right deny,
 Or suffering spirits urge their plea,
 Be thine a voice to smite the lie,
 A hand to set the captive free !

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

MAY, 1879.

THE DAY OF SMALL THINGS.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

“Some time afterward, it was reported to me by the city officers that they had ferreted out the paper and its editor. His office was an obscure hole; his only visible auxiliary a negro boy; and his supporters a few very insignificant persons, of all colors.”—Letter of Hon. H. G. Otis.

IN a small chamber, friendless and unseen,
 Toiled o'er his types one poor, unlearned young man;
 The place was dark, unfurnished and mean,
 Yet there the freedom of a race began.

Help came but slowly; surely, no man yet
 Put lever to the heavy world with less;
 What need of help? He knew how types were set,
 He had a dauntless spirit and a press.

Such earnest natures are the fiery pith,
 The compact nucleus round which systems grow;
 Mass after mass becomes inspired therewith,
 And whirls impregnate with the central glow.

O Truth! O Freedom! how are ye still born
 In the rude stable, in the manger nursed!
 What humble hands unbar those gates of morn
 Through which the splendors of the new day burst!

What! shall one monk, scarce known beyond his cell,
 Front Rome's far-reaching bolts, and scorn her frown?
 Brave Luther answered, YES!—that thunder's swell Rocked Europe, and discharmed the triple crown.

“Whatever can be known of Earth we know,”
 Sneered Europe's wise men, in their snail-shells curled;
 “No!” said one man in Genoa; and that NO
 Out of the dark created this New World.

Who is it will not dare himself to trust?
 Who is it hath not strength to stand alone?
 Who is it thwarts and bilks the inward MUST?
 He and his works like sand from earth are blown.

Men of a thousand shifts and wiles, look here!
 See one straightforward conscience put in pawn
 To win a world! See the obedient sphere,
 By bravery's simple gravitation drawn!

Shall we not heed the lesson taught of old,
 And by the Present's lips repeated still,
 In our own single manhood to be bold,
 Fortressed in conscience and impregnable will?

We stride the river daily at its spring,
 Nor in our childish thoughtlessness foresee
 What myriad vassal streams shall tribute bring,
 How like an equal it shall greet the sea.

O small beginnings, ye are great and strong,
 Based on a faithful heart and weariless brain;
 Ye build the future fair, ye conquer wrong,
 Ye earn the crown, and wear it not in vain!

INDEX.

A.

- Abolitionists, urge immediate emancipation, 111; advocate education of colored youth, 119; attempt to put them down by law, 213-219.
- Adams, John Quincy, his estimate of the Union, 342.
- Adams, Dr. Nehemiah, drafts Pastoral Letter, 262; addresses questions to slaveholders and is rebuked by Gov. Wise, 269.
- "African Repository," The, extract from, 103.
- Alton, Ill., riot in, and death of Mr. Lovejoy, 226.
- American churches favor slavery, 70.
- American Board hostile to anti-slavery, 74.
- American Bible Society, its neglect of the slaves, 157; proposition from Anti-Slavery Society ignored, 157.
- American Tract Society mutilates publications in the interests of slavery, 185.
- American Union for the relief and improvement of the colored race, 189; pro-slavery in its character, 189; its early death, 190.
- American Anti-Slavery Society, organized in New York, 145; delegates insulted, 149; spirit of the convention, 149; its declaration of sentiments, 152; closing address of the president, 154; begins operations in New York, 155; its officers, 155; large subscriptions for its work, 156; its first anniversary, 157; sends its publications to the South, 191; excitement in consequence, 192; publications burned in Charleston, 193; clergy approve the deed, 193; society admits women, 286; protest against the measure, 286; scheme for rescinding the action, 287; meeting in New York, 290; admission of women confirmed, 291; withdrawal of certain members and organization of new society, 292; bad effects of the secession, 319; the organization still formidable, 320; its management transferred from New York to Boston, 322; its anniversary in New York in 1850 disturbed by the Rynders mob, 381; driven from New York for two years, 381; Mr. Garrison advocates its dissolution in 1864, and his withdrawal, 388; Mr. Quincy's concurrence with Mr. Garrison, 388; the author's view of the subject, 388; the continuance of the society voted, 389.
- American Abolition Society, 340.
- American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society organized, 292; comments on, 293-294; testimony of Lewis Tappan concerning, 294; the new society a failure, 296.
- American Missionary Association, 296.
- American slavery and Methodism, 237.
- Andrew, J. O., Methodist bishop, 240.
- Anti-Slavery meetings, ministers reluctant to pray in, 72.
- Anti-Slavery Society, the first, 83; meetings and organization, 83-86; its preamble and constitution, 85-86; original members, 86; its first officers, 87; its appeal to the public, 89.

- Anti-Slavery sentiment, clerical, 140; declaration of, 140; its substance, 141; eminent signers, 111.
- Anti-Slavery Society in Lane Seminary organized, 169; anti-slavery agitation, progress in, 182.
- "Anti-Slavery Bugle," The, 324.
- Anti-Slavery workers, various, 333.
- Apologies for slavery, 159.
- Attitude of the churches, 159.
- Appendix, 404-421.
- Austin, James T., defends the Alton mob, in Faneuil Hall, 228; rebuked by Wendell Phillips, 229.

B.

- Bacon, Benj. C., member first anti-slavery society, 86.
- Bacon, Rev. Dr. Leonard, champion of Colonization, 104; his opinion of slavery, 104.
- Baltimore, Garrison's arrival there, 28; its slave traffic, 30; Garrison's views denounced, 31; efforts to crush the new movement, 32.
- Bailey, Dr. Gamaliel, edits "The Philanthropist," 222.
- Baptists, Freewill, their anti-slavery record, 81; refuse to commune with slaveholders, 81.
- Baptists, their complicity with slavery, 244.
- Barnes, Albert, his declaration concerning slavery, 156; his view of the duty of the churches, 247.
- Beecher, Edward, 224.
- Beecher, Lyman, disapproves of Garrison's views, 44-45; becomes president of Lane Seminary, 165; his course with the students, 167; discourages discussion of the slavery question, 174; sacrifices a great opportunity, 177.
- Beecher, Henry Ward, his charge of bitterness against Mr. Garrison, 56.
- Bible, The, Mr. Garrison's opinion of, 365.
- Birney, James G., 190; emancipates his slaves, 190; joins the abolitionists, 192; his characteristics, 191; persecuted in the South, 220; establishes a paper in Danville, Ky., 220; removes it to Ohio, 221; citizens of Cincinnati demand its suppression, 221; its office destroyed by a mob, 222; his testimony concerning the churches, 247.
- Blagden, Rev. Dr., reports concerning, 275.
- Boston, Thompson robbed in, 136; pro-slavery demonstration in, 195; female anti-slavery society attacked, 196; Mr. Garrison mobbed and lodged in jail, 198.
- "Boston Courier," The, prints letters from Garrison while in prison, 35; favors suppression of "The Liberator," 213.
- Bowring, John, regrets exclusion of women from London Conference, 350.
- Bradford, Rev. Arthur B., 250.
- Bright, John, speech at the Garrison breakfast in London, 353-354.
- Brougham, Lord, speech by, 97.
- Buffum, Arnold, lecturing agent, 94; battles with the Colonization Society 94; debate with Mr. Danforth, 116.
- Burleigh, Charles C. and Wm. H., 127.
- Buxton, Sir T. F., first interview with Garrison, 133.

C.

- Canterbury, Conn., Miss Crandall's School at, 124.
- Caste, Spirit of, 102.
- Channing Dr., Remarks on Milton, 59; his tribute to abolitionists, 201; condemns the Alton riot, 227; his view of the Constitution, 336.

- Chapman, Maria Weston, her work, 205-206.
- Charleston, S. C., post-office broken open by a mob, 192; anti-slavery mail-matter burned in, 193.
- Child, David Lee, member first anti-slavery society, 86; edits "Anti-Slavery Standard," 297.
- Child, Lydia Maria, her "Appeal," 139; edits "Anti-Slavery Standard," 297.
- "Christian Advocate, The," abuses abolitionists, 158.
- Christianity, elevated by the anti-slavery movement, 371, 372.
- Churches. Attitude of, 234.
- Cincinnati, Lane Seminary, founded in, 165; pro-slavery sentiment of the city, 171; Wattles' colored school in, persecuted, 171.
- Clarkson on the Slave Trade, 373.
- Clerical Abolitionists, Appeal of, 275; replied to by Mr. Garrison and A. A. Phelps, 276; its author afterwards retracts, 276.
- Coffin, Joshua, member first anti-slavery society, 86.
- College for colored youths proposed, 120; scheme considered in colored convention, 121; opposition to, 122.
- Colleges, Northern, prevent agitation among students, 185.
- Collins, John A., 290, 300.
- Colonization Scheme, Mr. Garrison's exposure of, 130; its repudiation by English abolitionists, 130.
- Colonization Society, Dr. Beecher's appeal for, 89; Mr. Garrison's reply, 89; opposed by Arnold Buffum, 94; its prejudice against the negro, 103; Garrison's battle with, 112; Garrison's "Thoughts" on, 114; colored people opposed to, 117; their protests, 118.
- Colored Lad, Anecdote of, 101.
- Colored People, their expulsion from the country impracticable, 119.
- Colored Youth, Education of, 119.
- Colorphobia Illustrated, 100.
- "Columbia (S. C.) Telescope," extract from, 186.
- Congregational Association of Mass., pastoral letter by, 262; comments on, 268-265; Whittier's poem on, 265-267.
- Conservative Anti-Slavery Society organized in Boston, 188; its failure, 190.
- Constitution, demoralizing influence of, 338; claimed by some to be anti-slavery, 339; fallacy of the claim, 340; Garrison's remarks thereon, 341.
- Converse, Rev. A., opposes education of the blacks, 122.
- Covenanters. Old School, opposed to slavery, 250.
- Cox, Dr. S. H., preaches against slavery, 162.
- Crandall, Prudence, her school for young ladies at Canterbury, Conn., 124; admits colored pupil, 124; her school denounced in town meeting, 125; receives new pupils, 125; persecutions commenced, 126; committed to jail, 127; her house attacked and fired, 127.
- Crandall, Dr. Reuben, thrown into jail in Washington, 218.
- Curtis, Geo., of R. I., opposes Southern demands, 215.

D.

- Danforth, Rev. Joshua N., his sneers at the anti-slavery movement, 87; challenge to debate, 116; attacks Mr. Buffum, 116.
- Day of Small Things, poem by Lowell, 420-421.
- District of Columbia, slavery in discussed, 327.
- Disunion, question of, 334.
- Douglass, Frederick, criticises the Free Soil movement, 315.
- Dred Scott Decision, its influence on the country, 380.
- Dresser, Amos, flogged as an abolitionist in Nashville, Tenn., 218.

E.

- Early friends of "The Liberator," 53.
 Edwards, Dr. Jonathan, his anti-slavery sermon printed, 156.
 Effects of Boston mob, 203.
 Emancipation, Immediate, advocated by Mr. Garrison, 30.
 Emancipation Proclamation, 382.
 "Emancipator, The," becomes anti-slavery organ, 155.
 Emerson, Ralph Waldo, opens his pulpit to the abolitionists, 90.
 English press on slavery, 97.
 England, Mr. Garrison's first visit to, 129; opportune arrival in, 130.
 Exeter Hall, Garrison's speech in, 131.
 "Evangelist, New York," a powerful ally, 157.
 Evarts, Jeremiah, Garrison's interview with, 45.
 Everett, Edward, his servility in Congress, 215; his message while Governor of Mass., 216.

F.

- Faneuil Hall, Pro-Slavery meeting in, 195; meeting to condemn the Alton outrage, 228.
 Female Anti-Slavery Society in Boston mobbed, 196.
 Fisk, Dr. Wilbur, his views, 238.
 Folsom, Abigail, anecdote concerning, 304.
 Foster, Stephen S., his character, 331; Lowell's lines on, 331.
 Free Church of Scotland, collects funds in the Southern States, 351; its action denounced in Scotland, 351; protests from American Abolitionists, 352; Mr. Garrison speaks on the subject, 352.
 Free discussion, Mr. Garrison's faith in, 374-376.
 Freedom of the Mind, (Sonnet), 34.
 Free Presbyterian Church, organized, 250.
 Frothingham, O. B., 329.
 Fuller, John E., member first Anti-Slavery Society, 86.
 Fugitive Slave Law, its effects, 380.
 Furman, Rev. Richard, Southern Baptist clergyman, sale of his chattels, 244.
 Furness, Rev. Dr. Wm. H., 324.

G.

- Garnet, Henry Highland, 290.
 Garrison, Wm. Lloyd, birth and boyhood, 24; learns the printing trade, 25; contributes to the newspapers, 25; makes acquaintance of Lundy, 25; edits the "Free Press" and "The National Philanthropist," 25; establishes "The Journal of the Times," 26; petitions Congress for abolition of slavery in District of Columbia, 26; joins Mr. Lundy in Baltimore, 28; their paper, 29; advocates immediate emancipation, 29; sued for libel, convicted and imprisoned, 33; sonnets by Mr. Garrison, 33, 34, 39, 62; fine paid by Arthur Tappan, 33; dissolves partnership with Lundy, 38; starts "The Liberator," 39-43; first meets Arthur Tappan, 41; rewards offered for his arrest in the South, 60; replies to the "National Intelligencer," 64; his early Orthodoxy, 67; sonnet, "The Sabbath Day," 69; secretary first Anti-Slavery Society, 87; his prophecy regarding it, 88; criticises Lyman Beecher, 89; denounces the spirit of caste, 102; remarks in 1832, 106; address in Park Street Church, 112; battle with Colonization Society, 124; his "Thoughts on Colonization," 114; visits England, 129; speech in Exeter Hall, 131; letter in "London Patriot," 132; incident concerning, 133; invites George Thompson to visit the United States, 134; scheme to form National Anti-Slavery Society, 141; his "Declaration of Sentiments," 151-153; mobbed in Boston, 197; dragged through the streets and lodged in jail, 198; discharged next day, 200; his "heresies" denounced, 273; replies to a "Clerical Appeal," 276; remarks on the Alton tragedy, 281; discusses the Peace question, 282; plan to put him out of office, and its failure, 283; his tribute to Arthur Tappan, 299; opposes the Liberty party and reasons therefor, 307-314; advocates "No union with slaveholders," 338; his position vindicated by the Rebellion and its results, 348; his visit to England in 1840, 349; declines to be a member of the London Anti-Slavery Conference, 350; third trip to Great Britain in 1846, 351; condemns the policy of the Free Church of Scotland, 352; visits Europe in 1867, 352; attends Exposition at Paris, 352; public breakfast tendered him in London, 353; distinguished guests present, 353; speech by John Bright, 353; official address by Goldwin Smith, seconded by Earl Russell, 355, 356; John Stuart Mill's address, 356; Mr. Garrison's reply, 356-358; speech by George Thompson, 358; other honors to Mr. Garrison, 353; his visit to Europe in 1877, 359; visits to old friends, 369; his religious opinions, 363-366; denies the charge of infidelity, 367-368; impatient with Lincoln's administration, 382; satisfied with his Proclamation of Emancipation, and advocates his re-election, 382; visits Charleston at the flag-raising on Fort Sumter, 382; his reception and the speeches on the occasion, 383-387; discontinues "The Liberator" in 1865, and his valedictory, 390-392; his last years, 393-395; testimonial to him, 394; author's estimate of his character, 395-399; his last illness and death, 399-401; his funeral, 402, 403.

Garrisonian movement, its effect on the Republican party, 345.

Gay, Sydney Howard, 297.

"Genius of Universal Emancipation," The, 28.

Glasgow Emancipation Society invites Mr. Garrison to visit Scotland, 351.

Goodell, Wm., edits "Emancipator," 156; his "Slavery and Anti-Slavery," 317.

Green, Beriah, 144; presides at organization of Am. Anti-Slavery Soc., 154.

Greely, Horace, his "Great American Conflict," 317.

Grimké, Angelina and Sarah, address Northern women, 259; their success, 260.

Guiltless Prisoner, The (Sonnet), 33.

Gurley, Ralph R., his opinion of the negro, 104.

H.

Hall, Robert B., member first Anti-Slavery Society, 86.

Hayne, Robert Y., writes Mayor of Boston concerning "The Liberator," 60.

"Herald of Freedom," 301.

Higginson, Thomas Wentworth, 329.

Hitchcock, Jane Elizabeth, 324.

Holley, Hon. Myron, 305.

Hopkins, Samuel, his Dialogue on Slavery printed, 156.

Hopper, Isaac T., 145.

I.

Infidelity, charge of, against Mr. Garrison and his defence, 363-369.

Introduction, by John G. Whittier, ix.-xii.

J.

Jackson, Francis, his bravery, 203

Jay, Hon. Wm., his testimony, 80; his "Inquiry," 163; its powerful influence, 163; denounced by the pro-slavery press, 163; loses his place on the bench, 163; his noble work for the cause, 163; arraigns the churches, 243; favors disunion, 342.

Jocelyn, Rev Simeon S., 119.

John: on, Oliver, member first Anti-Slavery Society, 86.

Johnson, Samuel, 320.

"Journal of Commerce" exults over abolition divisions, 320.

K.

Kelley, Abby, 291, tribute to her, 303.

Kendall, Amos, Postmaster-General, upholds Southern Postmasters, 194.

Knapp, Isaac, member first Anti-Slavery Society, 86.

L.

Laight Street Presbyterian Church, damaged by a mob, 162.

Lane Theological Seminary, 165; endowed with ten thousand dollars by Arthur Tappan, 165; Lyman Beecher, its President, 165; its students, 166; they form a colonization society, 166; debate the slavery question, 167; result of the debate, 168; Anti-Slavery Society organized, 169; Dr. Beecher discourages discussion, 174; trustees disband Anti-Slavery Society in the Seminary, 174; Gag law applied, 174; Students leave the Seminary, 175; their appeal to the Christian public, 175; answer of the Faculty, 175; they compliment the students, 176; complain of their imprudence 176.

Leavitt, Rev Joshua, edits N. Y. "Evangelist," 157.

Lectures on Slavery, by A. A. Phelps, 140.

Legislatures of certain Southern States, demands of, 214.

"Liberator, The," started in Boston, 39-43; the South excited over it, 43; size and appearance of first volume, 50; its office, 51; discontinued in 1865, 390; Mr. Garrison's valedictory, 390-392.

Liberty party, formation of, 305; Mr. Garrison opposed to, 307; his reasons therefor, 307-314.

London Anti-Slavery Conference refuses to admit female delegates, 340.

Loring, Ellis Gray, member first Anti-Slavery Society, 86.

Lovejoy, Elijah P., 222; edits a religious paper in St. Louis, 223; condemns the lynching of a negro, 223; office mobbed, 223; removes to Alton, Ill., 223; property destroyed by a mob, 223; establishes the "Alton Observer," 224; defends his rights in a public meeting, 224; another riot and his death, 226.

Lowell, James Russell, tribute to Mrs. Chapman, 207; lines on Phillips, 230; contributes to "Anti-Slavery Standard," 297; lines on Abby Kelley, 303; on Stephen S. Foster, 331; on Parker Pillsbury, 332; "The Day of Small Things," 420-421.

Lundy, Benjamin, his early labors, 21; meets Mr. Garrison, 27; their partnership, 28; partnership dissolved, 38

Lunt, George, his report to the Mass. Legislature, 216.

M.

Mahan, Rev. Asa, 174.

Marcy, Gov L., 214.

Martineau, Harriet, 203.

May, Rev Samuel J., befriends Miss Crandall, 126; remonstrated with by a New York merchant, 184; his experience with the Quakers, 252

Massachusetts, Gov. Everett's recommendations to legislature of, disregarded, 217.

"Massachusetts Abolitionist," The, 283, 285.

Massachusetts Abolition Society organized, 284.

McDuffy, Gov. of S. Carolina, his message, 213.

McKim, James Miller, 3.3.

- Methodist Book Concern, suppress anti-slavery passages in their reprints, 185.
 Methodist Episcopal Church, anti-slavery agitation in, 234-243; case of Bishop Andrew, 240; division of the church, 241.
 Methodism, Whedon's defence of, 75.
 Mill, John Stuart, address at the breakfast to Mr. Garrison, 356.
 Ministers decline to pray in anti-slavery meetings, 72.
 Mob year, 183.
 Mob in Boston, 196-198.
 Montpelier, Vt., mob in, 203.
 Morgan, Prof. John, 168.
 "Morning Star," The, Freewill Baptist organ; its influence against slavery, 81.
 Mott, Lucretia, 256.

N.

- Nat Turner Insurrection, 61; debate on in Virginia legislature, 107.
 "National Intelligencer, The," extract from, 63; Garrison's reply, 64.
 National Anti-Slavery Society, 144; its convention in Philadelphia, 147.
 "National Era," The, 295.
 "National Anti-Slavery Standard," 296.
 Newcomb, Stillman B., member first Anti-Slavery Society, 86.
 New England Convention admits women, 271; the innovation denounced, 273.
 New England Anti-Slavery Society, 86; appeal to the public, 89.
 New England Non-Resistance Society, 282.
 New Haven, proposed location of Colored College in, 120; strong opposition to, 123.
 New Organization, The, 284; not a success, 298.
 New York, headquarters Anti-Slavery Society in, 155; Dr. Cox's church attacked, 162; Lewis Tappan's house sacked, 162.
 New York City Anti-Slavery Society, "Emancipator" transferred to, 288.
 Newspapers, extracts from Southern, 186.
 Newspapers, Garrisonian after 1840, 325.
 Northfield, N. H., anti-slavery lecturer arrested in, 188.
 Noyes Academy, Canaan, N. H., ruined by a mob, 188.

O.

- O'Connell, Daniel, regrets exclusion of women from London Conference, 350.
 Orthodox Abolitionists, they establish a new society, 284.

P.

- Park St. Church, colored merchant in, 100.
 Parker, Miss Mary S., 196.
 Parker, Theodore, sympathizes with the Garrison movement, 323.
 Parties limited by the Constitution, 309.
 Pastoral Letter of Massachusetts General Association, 262.
 Peace question, The, 282.
 Pennsylvania Hall burned, 211.
 "Pennsylvania Freemen," 323.
 Phelps, Rev. Amos A., becomes an abolitionist, 73; his definition of slavery, 73; his noble service, 74; his lecture on slavery, 140; ten thousand dollars offered in New Orleans for his arrest, 187; replies to the "Clerical Appeal," 276.

- Philadelphia, National Anti-Slavery Convention in, 147; unfriendly spirit toward it, 148; colored people mobbed, 162; Pennsylvania Hall in burned, 211.
- "Philanthropist, The," established by Mr. Burney, 221.
- Phillips, Wendell, speech in the Alton meeting at Faneuil Hall, 229; Lowell's lines on, 230; remarks at Mr. Garrison's funeral, 404-416.
- Pillsbury, Parker, 332; Lowell's description of, 332.
- Postmasters at Charleston, and other places at the South, refuse to deliver anti-slavery publications, 194; instructions from Postmaster-General, 194.
- Pro-slavery demonstration in Boston, 194.
- Publishers erase anti-slavery sentiments from reprints, 185.

Q.

- Quaker, Anecdote of, 97.
- Quakers, early opposition to slavery, 20; their meeting-houses closed against early anti-slavery lecturers, 96; discourage anti-slavery agitation, 251.
- Quincy, Edmund, joins the abolitionists, 234; speaks in anti-slavery meeting on death of Lovejoy, 231; effective anti-slavery writer, 232; contributes to "Anti-Slavery Standard," 297; coincides with Mr. Garrison as to the dissolution of the American Anti-Slavery Society, 388.

R.

- Rankin, Rev. John, 250.
- "Richmond Whig," extract from, 186.
- "Right and Wrong in Massachusetts," 285.
- Robinson, Marius R., missionary to colored people, in Cincinnati, 178; in Mr. Birney's office, 179; warned at Grandville, G., 179; mobbed at Berlin, tarred and feathered, 180; edits the "Anti Slavery Bugle," 180.
- Rogers, Nathaniel P., edits "Herald of Freedom," 301; alienation from Mr. Garrison, 302; Pierpont's collection from his writings, 302.
- Russell, Earl, his public apology, 356.

S.

- Sabbath Day, The, Sonnet, 69.
- "Savannah Georgian," The, testimony of, 373.
- Scott, Rev. Orange, assailed in Worcester, 188; "Methodist Anti-Slavery Advocate," 237.
- Sectarianism in the anti-slavery movement condemned, 280.
- Sewell, Samuel E., member first anti-slavery society, 86.
- Shedd, Dr. W. T. G., on hard language, 57.
- Slaveholders alarmed at Garrison's views, 30.
- Slavery, early opponents of, 20; hopes of its early abolition, 92; abolished by Southern madness, 311.
- Shelter for Colored Orphans, Philadelphia, set on fire, 211.
- Sloane, Rev. J. R. W., 250.
- Smith, Gerrit, joins abolitionists, 209.
- Smith, Goldwin, address at the Garrison breakfast, 355.
- Snelling, Wm. J., member first anti-slavery society, 86.
- Snowdon, Father Samuel, anecdote of, 72.
- Sonnets by Mr. Garrison, 33, 34, 39, 62, 63.
- Soule, Bishop, his views, 238.
- South, spirit of the, 186.
- Southern clergy, threats of, 186-187.
- "Spectator, The Christian," 104.

- Spiritualism, Mr. Garrison's belief in, 376.
 Stanton, Henry B., 172.
 Stewart, Alvan, 210.
 Stockton, Henry K., member first anti-slavery society, 86.
 Storrs, Rev. Charles B., 142; signs Mr. Phelps' declaration, 143.
 Storrs, Rev. George, arrested in Northfield, N. H., 188.
 St. Louis, Mr. Lovejoy's paper in, suppressed, 223.
 Subjects omitted, 377.
 Sullivan, Hon. Wm., 213.
 Sumter, Fort, flag-raising at, 382, 383.

T.

- Tappan, Arthur, pays Mr. Garrison's fine, 38; first meets Garrison, 41; contributes one thousand dollars for colored college, 120; employs counsel for Miss Crandall, 127; endows Lane Theological Seminary, 165; aids Mr. Wattles, 170; urged to withdraw from the anti-slavery cause, 184; twenty thousand dollars offered in New Orleans for his seizure, 187; his testimony concerning the churches, 249.
 Tappan, Lewis, interviews Bible Society, 157; remarks by, 249; views in 1855, 249.
 Testimonies against the churches, 247-249.
 Texas, Annexation of, discussed, 327.
 Thacher, Moses, member first anti-slavery society, 86; his appeal to the public, 89.
 Thatcher, Judge Peter, his charge to jury, 212.
 Thome, James A., 172.
 Thompson, George, 133; Brougham's tribute to, 134; his visit to the United States, 135; mobbed in Boston, 136; second visit to the U. S., 137; his character, 138; attends flag-raising at Fort Sumter, 383.
 Trask, Rev. George, speech in N. E. Anti-Slavery Convention, 284.

U.

- Union, The, John Quincy Adams' estimate of, 342.
 Utica, N. Y., anti-slavery meeting mobbed in, 208.

V.

- "Vermont Chronicle," opposes abolitionists, 208.
 Virginia, its domestic slave trade, 109.

W.

- Walker, James W., 325.
 Wattles, Augustus, establishes colored school in Cincinnati, 170.
 Wayland, Dr., his views, 244.
 Weld, Theodore D., student at Lane, 168; interviews Dr. Beecher, 169; writes appeal of Lane students to the public, 175; his "Slavery as it is," 178.
 Wesleyan Methodist Church, formation of, 240.
 Western Anti-Slavery Society, 324.
 West India Islands, abolition of slavery in, 164; its encouragement to American abolitionists, 164.
 Western Reserve College, its anti-slavery sentiment, 142.
 Whedon, Rev. Dr., claims that Methodism was early anti-slavery, 75; claim refuted, 76-78.
 Whipple, Charles K., 329

- Whittier, John G., introduction by, ix.-xii.; his early songs, 96; his poem on death of Charles B. Storrs, 143; poem on clerical oppressors, 193; poem on Pastoral Letter, 265-267; criticises the "Clerical Appeal," 279; poems on Mr. Garrison, 417-420.
- Willberforce, death of, 131.
- Williams, Ransom G., indicted in Alabama, 218.
- Wilson, Henry, his "History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power," 317.
- Windham County, why Republican, 128.
- Woman Question, The, 271.
- Women, Activity of, 254; their petition for the abolition of slavery, 255; presence in the American Anti-Slavery Convention, 254.
- Worcester, Mass, Rev. Orange Scott assailed in, 188.

Z.

- Zion's Herald, friendly to abolitionists, 158.

Samuel Albert's

